Discontent.

A peasant lay on hospitable grass
To watch a silent cloud-procession pass,
And bathe in tempered sunshine sifting down
In softened radiance over the field and town.
A passing horseman drew his rein and said
"Good man, where travel you, by fancy led?
'Tis noontide sun that warms your grassy bed,
And yet I fear me you remain unfed,"

"I feed on wishes," thoughtfully replied
The peasant. Then he smiled and then he sighed.
"I'm tired of all the foolish gods I know:
I wish a greater minded god would grow;
One who would touch my master's heart to pay
To me, his laborer, more pence a day.
The earth is wide and green: the sky is fair,
And yet I find no mercy anywhere."

"Do beaten schoolboys pray for other rods?
Pray not," the horseman said, "a change of gods
If gods are cruel, all the gods dethrone:
If masters rob you, mastership disown.
Wish not to be part bound, but wholly free—
A god, a master of yourself to be,"

Popular Follies and Crimes.

BY JAMES S. DEXSON.

A "Liberal" editor says he would not defend the dead chiefs of his host if it had not been proved they were moral. Why, then, does he sell the works of Voltaire? Why does he sell the Queen Mab of Shelley? "Moral" these two mighty geniuses were not, as the editor well knows.

The man who proclaims his unquestioning faith in the "purity" of a woman and in the next instant demands a "surgical and medical examination" to make certain the fact of said "purity," is a spectacle for gods and men. If he and others of his genus would keep still no questions could be raised concerning the "purity" of the one he so awkwardly champions. Every stain upon her reputation has been put there by him and his fellow-reactionists. "Against stupidity even the gods are powerless."

Irreligious moral conformists pay to their leaders the compliment of believing that when the latter say they stand for liberty all-around, they mean the liberty only of those who agree with them and to the extent only that they agree. In so far as the radical leaders believe as the conformists believe, the latter have no doubt the leaders are honest enough to live their principles, but when the leaders advocate a deeper and wider liberty than the conformists can accept, then the conformists flatter the leaders by supposing they are hypocrites, that they teach what they are too good to practice! In other words, the conformists believe that their beloved chiefs are so degraded that they will deliberately direct their followers into quagmires of "immorality" which they will not go near themselves! So enamored are the conformists with their own ideals that they cannot conceive that other men's ideals may call out at least as loyal worship as do their own.

When professional moralists fall out, the public hears some wholesome truth. As an instance of this, listen to a denunciation of Rev. C. H. Parkhurst by Charlotte Smith's "Woman's Rescue League":

One Charles H. Parkhurst has done more harm to society than he can ever atone for during the period of his natural life. Through the agitation brought on by the said man in the pulpit and through society, this so-called reformer has been the means of driving disreputable women into the dwelling places of respectable women. The state of the city is worse than ever before, and a man with money and church influence at his command that will use the heartless language he has and plan such cruel methods against outcast women is a disgrace to the pulpit and Christianity as well. The name of the society of which he is president should be changed to the Society of the Propagation of Vice, Disease and Crime.

Now if Mr. Parkhurst will tell us what he thinks of the methods of Mrs. Smith we can strike a balance and throw both debtors out of the court of Reason.

When you hear the question, "Is he an honest boy?" you understand that the inquirer wants to knows if the boy indicated is honest as regards the property of other people. The honest boy does not steal, and, giving a little broader meaning to the word honest, he does not lie. The honest boy keeps his hands off the effects of his neighbors and he keeps his word. But when you hear the question, "Is she an honest girl?" your experience tells you that the inquirer wants to know if the girl asked about is still taboo. "Honest" has been transformed. It no longer refers to what may be called commercial integrity; applied to the girl, it seems that she has never failed to Conform. The honest girl does not love until she has received a license from an official. She can get a license to love, but she is still honest. In this she differs from the boy. He is an honest boy, even if he does love without a license. But he cannot get a license to steal or to lie, and even if he could he would be a thief and a liar, if he stole or lied. Odd, is it not, that a strong and rugged word like "honest" can be bent and twisted out of all resemblance to itself in the skinny and gnarled fingers of the imbecile Madame Grundy! The woman, having no property but her sex, had no use for commercial integrity, and so it came about that we say "She is honest" when we mean that she will not sell her sex (except legally) and will not use it without a license from man, who, having property, has use for common honesty but never thinks of calling himself *dis*honest when he loves without a license. The Freethinker who asks, "Is she honest?" meaning, Is she still taboo? fails to see that he is doing what he can to perpetuate the Christian sociology, which deprived woman of her property rights and left her with nothing but her sex with which to play at honesty. This is a vicious distinction which makes "honest" mean one thing in the case of a man and something entirely different in the case of a woman.

No reform work can succeed without the assistance of the press. The reform press must have the support of reformers or go down. These are two simple, elementary facts, and they should be within the comprehension even of moralists. All this jabbering about the connection of "The Truth Seeker" and the Freethought Federation proceeds either from thoughtlessness or from do-nothing envy, or from the two combined. "The Truth Seeker" keeps the Liberals informed concerning the schemes of the religious marplots and the counteracting work of organized Freethought and, naturally, the live Liberals take "The Truth Seeker" to get this information. Thus it happens that the Freethought lecturer finds that in every neighborhood the men and women who give him effective help are the men and women whom "The Truth Seeker" has told about the work that needs to be done and the laborers who are doing it. The same condition of affairs prevails in England, and there is a similar little group of fault-finders to pick at the management of the British Secular Union. It is the poorest kind of poor policy to circulate a paper which is continually nagging at Liberal workers on personal grounds and side issues, whose editor has no more discretion than to put into cold type every bit of information or misinformation that falls in his way and every vagrant fancy and foul suspicion that floats about in his brain, and which has never given the slightest indication that it voices the fundamental demands of Freethought, viz., Freedom of Investigation, Freedom of Expression, Freedom of Application. "The Truth Seeker" has its grave limitations, from my point of view, but it is a vigorous fighter along its own lines of work, and that work is a work that must be done, and the editor who can do it deserves our help, for we need him and his paper. And common justice demands that the aspersions of the uninformed or of the jealous be repelled.

The criminal immorality of orthodox "morality" was never better expressed—except by General Sickles's pistol—than in a poem written by Elizabeth Harman and printed in New York "Town Topics" of December 10, 1896. It is entitled, "A Woman's Love," and reads as follows:

The Maid. . . . Oh, whispering Wind that blows
Across the sea,
Where is my sailor now?
Pray answer me!

The Wind. . . . O'er waters calm, his boat Bounds swiftly on.
Your sailor treads the deck
With jest and song.

The Maid. . . . And in his heart, oh Wind,
What do you see?
A maid—like me?

The Wind. . . . Ah yes, I see a face
Of maiden there—
But she is bold and dark—
And you are fair.

The Maid. . . Oh, Wind, cease whispering!
If this be true,
Storm! Rage! Beneath the waves
Sink boat and crew!

I love him so! And him
Another charms!
Give him to Death, oh Wind,
Not to her arms!

I sincerely trust that the poetess did not express her own feelings in this horror of rhymed composition. Such a woman would depopulate a city to wreak her "love" on a wandering lover. Why she gives the title of "A Woman's Love" to the libel on her own sex, I do not know; certainly woman has no monopoly of this fiendish love of possession. This Harman of the old school so vindictively loves the unfortunate man of her choice that she will not only murder him but with him a whole ship's crew, thus willingly bringing poverty and despair into many other homes and hearts. Her love is as dangerous as the love of the Jewish Yahveh. Like that ancient tribal deity, whom she loveth she chasteneth, and every one else who gets in the way of her affectionate vengeance. The morality of the purity people sweats blood.

Abortion and the Comstock Law.

BY HENRY E. ALLEN.

In the Direct Legislation Record for December a Mrs. Ella B. Carter, of New Jersey, has a very complimentary review of my handbook on direct legislation, and upsets the whole article by closing with the following words:

"If there is one thing in the book to which, as a woman, I must take exception, it is the fling at the Comstock postal law, which is wrongly compared to Russian censorship. This law was made in the interest of social purity, and was desired and striven for by some of the women whose names are mentioned in the book in a list of noted people who advocate direct legislation. The effort to stop the dissemination of vile and obscene literature through the United States mails was made in the interest of pure homes, and all must admit that in the integrity of the family and the home lies the true basis of the State, the only sure foundation of our civilization."

No doubt thousands of intelligent and well-meaning people share the views here expressed by Mrs. Carter. For many years it has been a matter of surprise to me why so many hold to the belief that the Comstock law was intended to prevent the dissemination of obscene literature. This was never the real purpose of the law, and the fact that the "Police Gazette" and other similar publications have not been molested for years must be accepted as proof that this law does not prevent the dissemination of vile literature. The intent and purpose of the Comstock law is to prevent the dissemination of all knowledge pertaining to contraceptic science—not obscene literature.

Under this law Dr. E. B. Foote paid $5,000 fine for transmitting copies of his "Words in Pearl" through the mails, and there is no more obscenity in this publication than in Dickens' Dombey and Son. It is a work of such practical importance to the well-being of the race that it should be circulated at government expense, especially in the slums of all large cities and among the colored population of the south. Who would think of charging that Anna Besant's "Law of Population" is obscene or the "Reform of the Century," and many other similar works that have been ignominiously ruled out of the mails under this bigoted law? Mrs. Waisbrooker, Leroy Berrier and Moses Harman have been unreasonably persecuted under this law—was it for disseminating obscene literature?—such a charge would imply an insult to the life-long labors of these earnest reformers in the course of humanity.

In this connection I desire to give some facts that I have never before given to the public. During the four years I was secretary of the National Social Science League, of Chicago, I carried on a confidential correspondence which extended to almost every section of the union. It is my honest belief, from the facts I gained through this correspondence, that the Comstock law has been the cause of hundreds of deaths annually for the past twenty years by enforcing ignorance of contraceptic science, thereby creating a demand for all manner of abortion-producing drugs. Almost wholly on account of this law nearly all newspapers today teem with advertisements of "pennyroyal and tansy pills," and other emenagogues sold for the express purpose of inducing abortion, and the sale of these drugs, it is estimated, amounts to more than one million dollars annually.

If Mrs. Carter will investigate thoroughly the workings of the Comstock law she will find that "as a woman" she ought not to defend any such monstrosity. Mrs. Carter cannot desire more earnestly than I do the dissemination of only pure and useful literature, but before she lends her influence to the support of this law that enforces ignorance on the most vital questions of life and happiness and actually increases the national death rate she should at least be certain that her statements are founded on facts.

Much as I desire the adoption of direct legislation I believe the repeal of the Comstock law is of vastly more importance at this time.

The majority of women like titles. If you consider the matter you will find it quite natural. Titles can be divided. A duke makes a duchess. Whereas a man of brains cannot share his intellect with a fool.—Edgar Saltus.

Additional Notes Concerning Our Double Bereavement.

BY E. C. WALKER.

I am sure that an impartial review of the circumstances attending the sudden death of Samuel P. Putnam and May L. Collins will kill all the absurd rumors to the effect that one or the other of our comrades committed suicide. All who knew him admit at once that such imaginings about Putnam are too absurd for a moment's credence, and those who knew Miss Collins best are no less positive in scouting the scarcely veiled charges made against her. Before I went to Boston to attend the funeral of President Putnam and to gather information bearing upon the disaster, I dismissed as the reporters' idle guesses all the newspaper conjectures of suicide, and after a very careful examination of the place where our friends perished, after exhaustive questioning of the persons who were in a position to know all that can ever be known concerning the events of the fatal evening, and after (then and since) ascertaining much regarding the expressions and demeanor of Mr. Putnam and Miss Collins during that day and the immediately preceding days, I am more positive than at first that the catastrophe we so bitterly lament was an accident, pure and simple.

To prevent a possible misapprehension, let me say right here that I have no moral objections to suicide; that I hold that it is preposterous to claim that any man or woman is in duty bound to cling to life after life has ceased to be enjoyable. But it is a reflection on the intelligence of a person if that person destroys himself without a careful comparison of the apparent relative advantages of continued life and of extinction, or after a false balancing of the good and the bad sides of the ledger of life. I have too much faith in the mental soundness of both Samuel Putnam and May Collins to believe that either of them made the one blunder or the other. Life had not ceased to be enjoyable to them. Each faced a promising future. Each was planning work that it would take a lifetime to accomplish, and it was work in which their whole natures were enlisted. Each had high ambitions. Neither saw any evidence that the dead individual lives again, and therefore each realized most keenly the wisdom of making all possible of this one life. Neither feared the ghosts, and hence neither hesitated to live a full and rounded life. I reject as ridiculous and repel as an insult to the departed the assumption that either of our death-laureled comrades wantonly shattered the golden bowl of existence. They died by an accident, and by an accident belonging in a class alarmingly large. Of this kind of accident, more further along.

At the little dinner in Stoneham on the day of doom, the two who were to die early that night were planning widely for the coming year. In the party was a member of the Lilliputian Company. She was an old friend of both Mr. Putnam and the hostess. Mr. Putnam and Miss Collins were to travel and lecture in the secular cause; the prospective route of the Lilliputians and that of the Freethought champions were scanned and compared; all points of possible contact were noted, and it was arranged that the three friends should meet in several cities, including San Francisco, which sits in beauty by the Golden Gate, in that state of California which Mr. Putnam had done so much to keep out of the clutches of the ecclesiastical enemies of human liberty. "Isn't this a jolly dinner, girls?" he exclaimed in his jovial, happy way. All present were young (Putnam would never have grown old in spirit), hopeful, with eyes that looked forward and upward and saw the towering columns, the slender arches, the transplendent lights, and the iridescent hues which ever belong to the castles that Ambition and Youth and Love build in the Spain of sweet Fancy. At 6:25 the three travelers took the train for Boston. At 7:15 the Freethought workers said good night to the actress at the doors of her theater. In two hours or less, as subsequent developments show, the curtain had rung down forever on the lives of Samuel Putnam and May Collins.

It is asked how it could be possible for two persons in the full possession of their faculties to be overcome by illuminating gas. There is no mystery about it if all the contributory factors are taken into account. Such accidents are very numerous, and this attracts our attention and provokes our inquiry only because the victims were known and loved by us. Gas does not act upon the human system in the way commonly supposed. There is no suffocation, in the ordinary sense. The heart is affected, and unless the sense of smell gives warning, those subject to its influence may fall to the floor unconscious without any premonition of danger. Dr. Draper, Medical Examiner of Boston, in the certificate which he gave to Mr. Hoge, the lawyer representing Dr. Collins, the father of May Collins, stated that the gas now used in Boston is very poisonous, and a small quantity of it is sufficient to produce death, especially as it is almost odorless, and so takes its victims unawares. These facts, considered in connection with the further facts that Mr. Putnam's olfactory sense was totally destroyed years ago by nasal catarrh and that Miss Collins had a weak heart action, fully explain, to my mind, the apparent mystery of these deaths. The position of the bodies indicated that Miss Collins had been the first to feel the effects of the gas, as was to be expected, her heart being unable to withstand a severe pressure. As she fell, Mr. Putnam stooped or kneeled to raise her from the floor. This brought his head into a denser stratum of gas, away from the current of fresh air flowing in through the narrow crevice at the top of the window. Then he too, was overcome, and fell gently backward, so that he was in no way bruised by contact with the floor, while Miss Collins had a slight cut upon the forehead. The bodies lay with the heads at opposite sides of the room. What follows serves by illustration to make more clear my explanation and to demonstrate its reasonableness. In the "Truth Seeker" of December 26th, Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., is quoted as follows:

"I was talking with a lady yesterday who keeps a boarding house. She said that last winter an accident of a similar kind took place in her house. She discovered a faint odor of gas, and went about the house to see where it was escaping. She rapped at one of her lady boarder's doors, and the lady informed her that there was no escape of gas in her room. The landlady returned to her first floor, but was not quite satisfied, and determined to make another investigation. Failing to find any escape elsewhere she again went to the lady aforesaid. Speaking without opening the door, she still protested that there was no escape of gas there, and finally came to the door, but as she was speaking with the landlady, fell flat upon the floor. On investigation it was found that the gas was escaping in this very room. The fumes probably came on so gradually that the affected lady was not conscious of any escape of gas, but she was so near dead when they picked her up from the floor that they had to work at her until five o'clock the next morning to restore her."

Here is another case: Two or three days ago in Bridgeport, Conn., a mother and her five children were prostrated by gas, under these circumstances: Two of the children fell to the floor. Neither the mother nor any of the children had smelled escaping gas. The mother, unable to revive the children, and not knowing the cause of their sickness, hastened for a physician. When she returned with him, she found that the other three children had yielded to the same mysterious malady. Still neither she nor the doctor smelled gas, although both had come into the close room from the open air. The doctor, at his wit's ends, but suspecting poison, went for remedies. When he came back, he discovered that he had another patient—the mother was prostrate with her five little ones. Then, and not till then, was it found that gas was pouring from an open burner in the gas-stove.

In view of these striking facts I respectfully submit that all this talk about suicide and about "foul play" in connection with the deaths of Mr. Putnam and Miss Collins might profitably cease. It is wholly gratuitous. And the same is true of a great deal of other chatter in connection with the heartrending affair. Our friends are dead. They died because we have not learned all the ways of the natural forces which we have harnessed for our use. That tells the story in brief. It is enough.

Change of Form.

After years of delay and consideration, and not without serious misgivings, it has at length been decided to change Lucifer's form from the folio to the quarto. Of the many reasons, pro and con, the oft-expressed desire to have the paper in better shape for binding has prevailed. We are not satisfied with the new head-piece, but are promised by the friend who has kindly undertaken the task of getting it up for us, that a better one, with the same design will soon be prepared. Hoping that our friends will be pleased with the change, and that the Light-Bearer's usefulness will be increased thereby, we respectfully tender this change of form as a New Year's gift from the publisher and workers in office to our readers and patrons.

Two Copies to Each Subscriber.

Many of our friends tell us that they give away their copies of Lucifer to neighbors or send them by mail to distant relatives, and still would like to preserve a file for their own use, if in suitable shape for binding. To all who feel thus inclined the offer is hereby made of two copies each week for one dollar and fifty cents per year. The extra fifty cents, however, may be credited on the yearly subscription of the first subscriber sent in by the person taking two copies, or it may be credited, twenty-five cents each, to two new half-yearly subscribers, so that he who takes the two copies, one for missionary work, will really pay but one dollar. Or, if he so elects books will be sent, instead of crediting new subscribers with the fifty cents paid by him or her who acts as agent.

In the hope that many of our old subscribers will accept this offer we print a few hundred copies extra to supply back numbers from the beginning of the new year, and from beginning of the new series.

The Story.

Instead of the weekly installment of "Hilda's Home" we give a part of the many letters lately received, in relation thereto. Almost every mail brings letters of commendation, some subscribing for one or more copies in book form, and al expressing approbation of the sentiments therein inculated. One good friend in Massachusetts who has been a paying subscriber to Lucifer for ten or more years, and who expresses unabated interest in its work, says, "Send the paper till Hilda's Home is completed. When that is completed I shall ask you to suspend my name, but not to cancel my obligation until it is paid. My misfortune is simply a fine growth of children, loving and fairly happy, without corresponding growth of income."

Does not this letter—and many like it received by us, emphasize the need of such teaching as that given in the story, the central thought of which is the emancipation of woman, and the awakening of her sense of responsibility to the unborn?—which sense, when once fully awakened, will not permit her to bring children into the world until conditions are provided that will give to each a place at nature's table, such conditions as will not require the discontinuance of the favorite family paper in order that all may have bread.

We are glad to be able to say that if subscriptions continue to come in at the present rate, we shall soon feel it safe to begin the work of putting into book form a story that more than one reader tells us "fills a niche of its own" marking a new departure, a new Era in reform literature.

Among the Pioneers.

The man is thought a knave or fool,
Or bigot plotting crime,
Who for the advancement of his race
Is wiser than his time.

The close of the old year and beginning of the new, is a good time to speak a word in behalf of those who have deserved well of their kind, by trying to hew out new paths through the forests and jungles of ignorance and error, by following which paths the feet of coming generations may reach the table-lands of science, the highlands of unclouded reason, and of a better and purer morality.

Of these pioneers few if any deserve more honorable mention than do the Doctors Foote of New York City. For nearly if not quite forty years Dr. E. B. Foote, senior, has stood in the front rank of medical reformers. His "Medical Common Sense"—copyrighted in 1858, later revised and enlarged to nearly one thousand pages and published as "Plain Home Talk," marks a new era in medical science. No book in its line ever written, perhaps, has been more widely circulated—certainly none containing so much of the iconoclastic and the revolutio ary as regards the old medical superstitions, and the old notions of what is true and healthful in the social relations of women and men, and of what is due from parents to children, never has a volume of such size and character been so widely disseminated and so generally appreciated by the more thoughtful of both sexes, as has this the crowning work of a most useful and most honorable life—a life which we all hope has many years of useful and appreciated work still in the storehouse of the future.

For many years Dr. Foote, in conjunction with his son, Dr. E. B. Foote, junior, published a health journal, most of the time appearing promptly every month, that did most excellent work as a pioneer or pathfinder, on questions relating to health, happiness and long life. Meantime many smaller books,—such as "Science in Story," in five handsome volumes, the last being entitled, "Sexual Physiology for the Young;" "The Radical Remedy in Social Science," by Dr. Foote, jr.; "Handbook of Health Hints and Ready Recipes;" "Mothers' Manual," and several other very valuable contributions to radical literature, along reformatory lines, have appeared from the publishing house of these two pioneers, these brave thinkers and workers in the fields of humanitarian endeavor.

Of pioneers among the other sex—among woman workers and thinkers in the fields of unpopular reform, few if any have made a record more honorable or noteworthy than has Lois Waisbrooker, who is now on the Pacific coast, and visiting with relatives this winter, at Antioch, California. Having spoken at some length in recent issues of Lucifer, of Mrs. Waisbrooker and her various books, I will only add for this time that she is now asking for names of women to a "Declaration of Independence," of which the following is a copy:

Whereas:—Man, as a sex, has no more right to make laws and insist upon our obedience than we, as a sex, have to make laws and insist upon his obedience, and

Whereas:—The race lives upon the heart's blood of woman during its prenatal existence, thus making the character of its individual members largely dependent upon conditions surrounding her, and

Whereas:—Woman herself can best understand the conditions needed for her work as mother of the race, and

Whereas:—The present institutions of society are not adapted to woman's freedom,

Therefore we the undersigned, hereby repudiate man's rule over us, demanding the right to ourselves and such a re-adjustment of conditions as will enable us to do our Best Work for the human race.

To this "declaration"—the animus and scope of which, as our readers readily see, are in accord with Lucifer's work, and that of "Our New Humanity," Mrs. Waisbrooker adds:

We do not propose to organize under man-made law, but as numbers give a sense of strength it is well to ascertain how many are ready to make the above demand, in spirit, thus acting on the psychic plane to prepare the way for Woman's Era. The names of those who sign this demand will be given only to each other, and when their numbers warrant the effort, it is hoped that a paper may be established as the educational organ of this Loyal Sisterhood.

Accompanying this paper is another for men to sign—men who are willing to sustain women in this demand.

All who feel an interest in this matter and who would like to help Mrs. Waisbrooker in securing names to such declaration are hereby requested to correspond with her at address given above.

Another brave and very effective pioneer in the work of liberating the human intellect from the thralldom of old-time superstitions, is Matilda Joslyn Gage, of Fayetteville, New York, but who is spending the present winter with friends in Chicago. Few, if any, of our readers need to be told who Mrs. Gage is, or what she has done for her sisters and for the "advancement of her race." Her book, "Woman, Church and State," has written the name of its author in letters of living light on imperishable scroll of fame. Like the chief work of Dr. Foote, this book, the result of twenty years of assiduous and painstaking research, marks an era in the reform that aims at Woman's Emancipation, from creed and dogma, and from the despotisms of the Patriarchate, or of man's rule over woman and child. Though considerably advanced in years and somewhat feeble in health, Mrs. Gage shows no diminution of intellectual energy. On Sunday last I had the pleasure of hearing her make a short address before the Society of Anthropology, in reply to, or in criticism of, the paper of the afternoon, read by Miss Caroline Huling of this city. The subject of discussion was the "Relation of the Child to the State"—the author of the paper having taken the ground that it is the duty of the state to see that the parent does not neglect the child, and that if such neglect be persisted in, or in case of homeless and friendless orphans, the state should discharge the duties that naturally devolve upon the parent.

In her reply Mrs. Gage made a stirring protest against all interference by the state, and especially by the church. Were it not for the church and its obedient tool the state, the chains of slavery would never have been riveted upon woman's body, mind and soul, as they have been riveted, and children through this enslavement of mothers, would not have been deprived of their best inheritance, the right to be born well; and that therefore there would have been little need of help, from any quarter, to care for the waifs of human society if we had had less of state and church in the past. From the history of the past, take warning for the future.

The applause that followed showed that Mrs. Gage's remarks carried conviction to the hearers. Her present address is 120 Flournoy St., Chicago.

Of the younger pioneers in the field of fearless investigation, Le Roy Berrier of Minneapolis, Minn., deserves honorable mention. As an advocate of social and sexual purity from the standpoint of Nature and of Reason, Mr. Berrier has done good and efficient work. His best known work is "Sexuality and its Functions," the publication of which struck such consternation to the hearts of the privileged classes that its author was arrested, tried and sentenced to pay a fine of one hundred dollars. We are glad to know, however, that opposition has not daunted the brave young author, and that his book is now receiving much commendation and is being widely circulated. And thus is fulfilled the saying of Shakespeare, "The whirligig of time gets in its revenges,"—and also the later saying of Mackay, I think it was,

"Ever the right comes uppermost,
And ever is justice done."

A Final Word About Homes.

BY A. WARREN.

I have no desire to continue a controversy with J. W. Gaskine. As to "freedom—what it is, and how possible," he says there is no real dispute between us. He agrees with me then, that individualizing the home is the proper thing to make freedom possible. This was my position, and why he attacked me I cannot see. Nor can I see why he still compares me to a general whose works have been assaulted and carried. As there has been no dispute, however, I can afford to humor his conceit, and I write, not for further defence of what has not been assailed, but to apologize for my part of the rudeness which may seem to have been reciprocal between us.

I confess that I felt the injustice of his blundering criticism, and was not in a mood to worship at the altar of conventional communism merely to justify his aspersions. However, I had no conscious design to make my words offensive to Mr. Gaskine personally, and I regret that he so construed them.

In this connection, it seems necessary to explain what I had hoped might pass without further mention, but what seems to have been the main root of my friend's mistake It has been my impression, from the beginning, that the title to my first article was changed in the Lucifer office. I certainly was surprised, when the article appeared with the word co-operative in its title. I could not remember with certainty, for a long time had elapsed between the writing and the publication; but nothing could be clearer, than that I or the printer had made a serious mistake. In my next article, therefore, without directly repudiating the authorship of the word, I took special care to make myself understood; and for that reason, I afterward thought Mr. Gaskin rude, in his manner of attack. I did think that, after the explanation I had made, he must be either dull or dishonest, to charge me with communism of the baser sort, not only in a general way, but in detail, and in contradiction of all I had written.

As I have said before, I have no objection to voluntary communism; to real communism, based on community of thought and feeling. But I have contended that conventional merging of interests, as in marriage, and in the communistic societies, enslaves the individual, by divesting him or her of the means of self-support, in case the outward relation becomes disagreeable; and this slavery destroys the real communion, the communism of the soul. I therefore propose that we abandon those "entangling alliances, which tend to subordinate the individual, and to crucify the higher aspirations of the human heart."

I am aware that, to some, the proposal of separate homes may seem to involve the sundering of the ties of love between the sexes, and denying to women the affectionate regard which they crave and need. For the reason given above I firmly believe the opposite. By maintaining her individuality, woman will not lessen the respect and esteem of her brother man. Nor will freedom, the freedom of the individual home, make men more promiscuous in their loving, than they have hitherto been. I believe they will be less so, for the reason that love will be reciprocal and satisfying, instead of selfish and superficial, as it has been in marriage. I believe that the deeper and more genuine it is, the more exclusive it becomes. Real love takes possession of the whole being, and fills it with blessing. And a soul filled with joy, is not prone to squander it in pursuit of other joy.

To woman, love is expensive. It brings her toil and pain. To her, the love that fails to share with her the burden of offspring is not genuine. Men who, by nature, seek to gather honey from many flowers, while one that has yielded its sweetness is left to wither and die, will, in the freedom of the new home, seek and not find. Only true hearts deserve love. In freedom, only the true heart will win love. If I believed otherwise, I would go back to marriage.

This is not casting a stone at the varietists. Paradoxical as it may appear, love is both exclusive and diffusive. It is not to be denied that we all love every body and every thing that brings us pleasure. And there is no limit, in either direction. The height, the depth, the immensity of the heaven that blooms, and breathes, and glows in harmonized human hearts, has not been measured nor treasured, even by imagination. But into this elysium the man who seeks pleasure at the expense of another is never permitted to enter. Equity is the key that unlocks the golden gates of paradise. The wealth of the soul is won by giving.

Our efforts may, indeed, fail, as our friend predicts; but should free grouping elude us, even as communism has so often slipped from its devotees, we will toil on, to the end, and welcome the freedom that the merciful grave will not deny us.

But we shall not fail from the causes which Mr. Gaskine suggests. Our ideas of property are not antagonistic to those of other people, even in so dark a state as Alabama. We propose to give an equivalent for what we receive. So far as heard from, nobody has ever objected to other people doing that. As to religion, we have none. Possibly some will not like us as well for that; but the day is past for driving people out of a neighborhood, on account of their lack of religion. There remains but the question of the sexes. We propose to live separate. What law is there to forbid us? What further agreement is required?

Evidently, our friend does not yet comprehend what he is criticising; for he still criticises, after confessing that there is no controversy. Why should he object to a few lonely people, even so few as two or three, coming somewhat nearer to each other, yet not so near as to sacrifice their individuality?

The Old and the New Ideal.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

"The Old and the New Ideal," by Emil Ruedebusch, is one of the most extensive of books on the subject of free love, free sexing and free motherhood. It seems to present all sides of the subject in the full light of reason and science.

Whether it proves its demands or not, depends more upon the reader than upon the writer.

While a majority of Radical Freedomists will accept the reasonings as irrefutable, yet there are many, who, like myself, will still continue to adhere to Dianism in opposition to free sexing and contraceptics. But all will be sure to read the whole book (347 pages) with appreciative interest and will find much to admire and to accept, as true and helpful

In commenting upon criticisms—page 315—the authorsays: "A lady friend writes—'The love of a varietist would bring me joy but mixed with pain. To every gladness he'd create there'd be an added bane. The roses he would offer would be full of thorns, and sting me to the quick. It would be the inexorable law; though he might kindly lavish much upon me, he'd take my peace of mind. And why? Because I'm so constituted, that when others receive the same, the gift decreases for me.'"

I agree with the lady that this is so, not only in love, but in many of the simplest treasures we have. A multiplication of duplicates despoils many a thing of much of its value. A chromo given with a paper, hangs on the walls of a dozen houses in one neighborhood, and soon loses its charm by its commonness. We see it till we tire of it.

There were six sisters of us at my girlhood home. Father would bring a bolt of calico and mother and children each have a dress of it—seven times duplicated. How very quickly we tired of it!

It's no wonder so many want hats, jewelry, etc. of special patterns of which no duplicate can be had. We are glad to feel that we have something that is ours alone.

We are willing others should share in love of our one specially beloved, but we wish to hold the first and best place in his heart, as long as he holds it in ours. We are Altruists, and want everybody to have a full share of the world's pleasures, blisses and happinesses, but we also want our own specialties for our own special selves.

The immortal I comes first, and always will do so. Not selfishly but centrally and naturally, because we are individualists, even while we are co-operativists and Altruists.

I wandered alone over the beach and undressing bathed
Laughing with the cool waters, and saw the sun rise,
And when I thought how my dear friend, My Lover,
Was on his way coming, O then I was happy,
O then each breath tasted sweeter,
And all that day my food nourished me more,
And the beautiful day passed well,
And the next came with equal joy,
And with the next at evening
Came My friend.

Sociologic Lesson. No XXIV.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

PROPER MODES OF TAXATION. Taxes which can be evaded, and taxes which are levied with reference to ease of collection irrespective of equitable return by the government, tend to unfit men for the education in justice and honesty which must precede successful reorganization. There are three forms of taxation avoiding these objections. 1. A poll tax, which may be a prerequisite to the right of suffrage, the right to bring suit or to claim police protection, to cover the expense of protection. 2. A land tax, provided it is equitably distributed, to cover the cost of streets, street lights, water distribution, and such improvements. Equitable distribution depends, not upon the estimated value of the land, but upon the advantages which are conferred upon its possessor by the government. 3. Stamp taxes, license fees, and similar taxes, for mail transportation, and other special advantage for which the citizens pays in proportion to his enjoyment of them. In this class may be included insurance taxes, for which the government may insure against sundry misfortunes, such as fire and robbery, which it can avert by special police or other protection. These taxes would be entirely voluntary; and the two preceding classes would be accepted by the community as equitable and proper.

The inquisitorial feature of taxation, such as counting the separate sheets or pieces of paper in a sealed letter, as was formerly done, and the restrictions against writing in a package or newspapers or merchandise at present existing, are gradually disappearing as unworthy of a free people; and even the semblance of individual compulsory taxation will cease when reorganization is attained.

That a man and woman should occupy the same house and daily enjoy each other's society, so long as such an association gives birth to virtuous feelings, to kindness, to mutual forbearance, to courtesy, to disinterested affection, I consider right and proper. That they should continue to inhabit the same house and to meet daily, in case such intercourse should give birth to vicious feelings, to dislike, to ill-temper, to scolding, to a carelessness of each other's comfort and a want of respect for each other's feelings—this I consider, when the two individuals alone are concerned, neither right nor proper; neither conducive to good order nor to virtue. I do not think it well, therefore, to promise, at all hazards, to live together for life.—Robert Dale Owen.

Protection against the tyranny of the magistrate is not enough; there needs protection also against the tyranny of prevailing opinion and feeling.—John Stuart Mill.

THE UNREVEALED RELIGION.

An address of great depth, strength, and beauty. By the veteran, J. K. Ingalls.

"The rainbow is not less beautiful and wonderful to me than to Noah, or to the aborigines, because I understand something of optics and the refraction of light. The rose is not less attractive because botany has taught us to analyze and classify it. The Good of Truth, whether we worship it as an entity or as a personality, or conceive of it as impersonal, is an ever-living and persistent principle man can never cease to revere and admire. And his growth in knowledge and progress in all things refining and elevating to his nature will be promoted, not retarded, by the true but unrevealed, and as yet "unloved religion, 'The Religion of Progress'."

VARIOUS VOICES.

Frank Bieber, Casselton, N. Dak.:—Book me for one copy of "Hilda's Home." If book is good may sell some in our news stand.

C. S. Wood, M. D., Sioux City, Iowa:—I will take at least one bound copy of the story. May want more if it continues as good as the part printed.

Merton Coffin, Longmont, Colo.:—If the story Hilda's Home does come out in book form I wish to have two copies of the best binding. I can send money for same whenever the publication is assured.

Mrs. A. D. Stone, Smith Centre, Kansas:—Inclosed find order for "Our New Humanity." I will also speak for a copy of "Hilda's Home," if the book is published later. You are doing a most worthy work, would that your labors could be appreciated and sustained by all of God's creatures.

I. N. Maxwell, Franklin, Wash.:—The wave of prosperity has struck me so hard I must ask you to discontinue sending Lucifer to me. After ten or twelve years of constant reading, it is like giving up one of my children, but I hope for the best and may be able to send money for another year or two in a few months.

W. N. Slocum, Los Angeles, Cal.:—The inclosed one dollar is for Volume II. of "Our New Humanity." You can put me down for six copies of "Hilda's Home" in paper (three dollars.) and two in cloth (two dollars,)—making five dollars. I want them for presents to people who might not buy the book, but will, I am sure, be glad to read it, and will be benefitted by the lessons the story teaches.

Elsie Cole-Wilcox, Lawrence, Wash.:—For some reason Nos. 631 and 632 of Lucifer have failed to reach me. I never want to miss a number at any time, for every one is good. But I am particularly anxious to get every installment of "Hilda's Home." If that story holds out as well as it has thus far, it will be worth a dozen — —s. I inclose stamps to help cover expense of sending the two missing numbers.

E. S. N., Phila.:—Kindly send a copy of "Diana," also a copy of Lucifer to Mrs. — —. This lady is twenty-five years of age, a good reasoner, and am fully convinced by placing within her reach progressive reading matter, it will eventually be of good service to her, and to many others who come under her influence. She is very outspoken, and surrounded by Catholic friends may cause some antagonism. While they may not accept they will have to listen, therefore good may be done.

W. P. Austin, Poplar, Calif.:—In regard to "Hilda's Home" I do wish I could promise to take a copy, but cannot promise absolutely. It is a grand story—not a bit too radical for me, either. I do hope it may be published in book form. Will do what I can to get my friends to subscribe for a copy each, also will write to you at once when I can see my way clear to subscribe for a copy. Speaking for myself, I should prefer that you would wait some time yet if necessary so as to get the required number of subscribers.

W. P. H., San Francisco, Cal.:—I have just found an old copy of your valuable paper and in looking it over, I find many things which seem to suit my ideas of truth and proper teaching and as I am something of a writer on those line myself, I hasten to write you asking you to send me copy of recent date. I will say that I have been a minister of the gospel for many years until two years ago when I became too liberal in my views to longer preach the old dogmas of the church, so I left it and am now free to think and speak as I please without fear of any. If Lucifer is still published, let me hear from you. Yours, looking truth in the face.

Touched with inspiration's fire;
Heart and soul in one desire;
Ever striving to and forth

Light on darksome paths of earth
In the shadows, quick and fast,
Ghosts are exorcised at last—
Hidden from our careless view,
Trailing ever life pain through.

Blessing on thy name shall rest;
Every woman shall be blest.
Angel hands are helping thee
Raise the Torch of Liberty,
Ever striving for the good—
Right the wrongs of womanhood.

H. Ford, Wash.:—I inclose stamps for as many copies of Lucifer No. 636 as you can afford to mail for that sum. Also eight cents for any back numbers you may care to send to be circulated.

I am glad you thought my article worth publishing—it may not be any better for circulating than much or most of what is printed in Lucifer, but some of my orthodox (sexually) friends may read it out of curiosity if I send it to them.

I will take one copy of Hilda's Home, if it turns out as radical as it has gone thus far.

I should like to send much more to help on Lucifer's work but can only do a little at a time.

I live in hopes of being in a position to do more for reform work than now, but the time may or may not come.

Walter Breen, Omaha, Neb.:—I have subscribed to "Our New Humanity" from the outstart and expect to subscribe for it as long as the gold standard of iniquity permits me. In reference to your article on Motherhood, I think about it much as I do about nearly everything you write. I think it is indeed excellent. I have not made any very deep study of the question of alliances between men and women—but I have always been an independent thinker and fully agree with you that until we have free mothers we are going to have a continuation of this hell on earth, at least for some centuries yet to come. Human beings, as the stream of life throws us around like flotsam and jetsam can, and do, exercise an influence upon one another—which I think in the main, among educated people, "makes for good." Public opinion, in other words, is this subtle unmeasured and perhaps unmeasurable force—but unless the human race starts right we cannot expect any great progress. The Oneida community was too far in advance of its surroundings, and the life there too ideal for these 19th century savages to permit it to exist.

LOVE, MARRIAGE, AND DIVORCE

And the Sovereignty of the Individual.

A Discussion between Henry James, Horace Greely, and Stephen Pearl Andrews. There are here included the final replies of Mr. Andrews, refused by the New York Tribune, and a subsequent discussion, occurring twenty years later, between Mr. James and Mr. Andrews.

"The great lesson for the world to learn is that HUMAN BEINGS DO NOT NEED TO BE TAKEN CARE OF. What they do need is such conditions of justice and freedom and friendly co-operation that they can take care of themselves. Provided for by another, and subject to his will as the return tribute, they pine, and sicken, and die. This is true equally of women as of men; as true of wives as it is of vassals or serfs. Our whole existing marital system is the house of bondage and the slaughter-house of the female sex. Whether its evils are inherent or incidental, whether they belong to the essence of or to the administration of the institution, whether they are remediable without or only by means of revolution, are the questions that now have to be discussed."

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. I., No. 2. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, JANUARY 13, E. M. 297. [C. E. 1897.] WHOLE No. 641.

The Morning Star

We have the morning star,
O foolish people, O kings!
With us the day-springs are,
Even all the fresh day-springs;
For us, and with us, all the multitudes of things.

O sorrowing hearts of slaves,
We heard you beat from far!
We bring the light that saves,
We bring the morning star.
Free love's good things we bring you, whence all good things are.

The strife of things and beauty,
The fire and light adored,
Truth and life-light'ning duty,
Love without crown or sword,
That by his might and godhead makes man god and lord.

These have we, these are ours,
That no priests give, nor kings;
The honey of all these flowers,
The heart of all these springs;
Ours, for where freedom lives not, there live no good things.

Rise, ere the dawn be risen,
Come, and be all souls fed;
From field, and street, and prison,
Come, for the feast is spread;
Live, for the truth is living; wake, for the night is dead.

—Swinburne.

Paragraphs.

BY REV. SIDNEY HOLMES.

Women will be slaves as long as there is special legislation for their protection.

Lucifer emits the X rays which reveal the distorted skeleton of conventional society.

Murder is not a bailable crime in Chicago—unless the man indicted for murder is wealthy and has a strong political "pull."

According to the Bible, man was created before woman. The new woman seems to be first in the creation of a new humanity.

The Rev. Caroline Bartlett of Kalamazoo, Mich., became a bride last week by performing her own marriage ceremony. She has set a good example for the maidens in her flock. A third person is superfluous in a marriage contract.

Dr. Tallman, a wealthy Chicago physician, eloped with Mrs. Jane Cannon, a divorcee, a few weeks ago. Mrs. Tallman promptly secured a divorce and the highly moral doctor made Mrs. Cannon an "honest woman" by marrying her the next day. Now the doctor declares Mrs. Cannon hypnotized him and made him marry her when he was drunk. He also says she deceived him by not telling him of her "former escapades." Having performed his duty to society by making Mrs. Cannon an "honest woman," the doctor now says he intends to apply for a divorce. If he gets it—and, as he lives in Chicago he certainly will get it—he intimates that he may try to persuade his former wife to make him an "honest man" by marrying him again.

BY JAMES S. DENSON.

Some day the people of New York will tire of sham reform and bogus reformers, and then several very vociferous persons will find themselves out of profitable jobs.—New York "Journal."

I wish I could believe this to be genuine prohecy, but history justifies me only in expect that the people will some day turn out the present set of bogus reformers and give another set their lucrative jobs. Evolution is a very slow process. The advance we make is so gradual that it takes the passage of one hundred or five hundred years to make it perceptible.

Society shuts its eyes to the tragedy of affectional death, and stops its ears to keep out the cries of its tortured victims. And this blindness and deafness it calls "propriety." It declares that human life is sacred, and yet refuses to permit the dissemination of that knowledge whereby the lives of millions of human embryos would cease to be annually sacrificed, because they would not be to be sacrificed. It says that it loathes impurity, and yet it is the great source of impurity, because it sets a price upon love and rewards legalized prostitution, while at the same time it drives uncounted thousands, men and women, into the other kind of prostitution.

How pitiful it is, this condition of the human mind which makes a woman's whole reputation depend upon A's consent or his refusal to consent that she express her love for B! It is this state of mind that makes otherwise intelligent men ask, "Was she honest?" It is this state of mind that makes usually rational men and women strive to prove that their brothers and sisters were babes in logic. It is this state of mind that makes hitherto honored leaders throw away their swords and scamper to the rear or get behind the trees of Disclaimer and Apology. Men have so long lied about sex, the fundamental fact of existence and the motor of progress, that they are as timorous in the presence of the naked truth as nurse-taught children are in the dark.

In an Eastern town not long since a man was sentenced to the penitentiary for a long term for the offense of hypnotizing a girl, as she alleged, and then associating with her. In Jamestown, N. Y., one Burton Main was arrested for hypnotizing a girl and marrying her. But the law is lame—it provides for no such crime, and so all that has been done is to keep the man in jail. That is characteristic of the law—it does not conceive it possible for a husband to sexually offend against his wife, save by impotence, and so while the man who, by means of hypnotism, associates with a woman not his wife, is sent to the penitentiary, the man who by the same means does the same thing, but takes the precaution to secure himself by a license giving him the "right" to so associate while they both shall live, need not fear any serious consequences, although his invasion is almost infinitely worse than that of the unmarried deceiver.

One other thought in this connection—the charge of hypnotism is one easily made but hard to substantiate. Every case based on such a charge needs the closest sifting, as does every case wherein a person accused of crime alleges in defense that he was hypnotized into the commission of the offense. "Hypnotism" is all too convenient a synonym for late repentance and loop-hole for escape.

The continuity of human life in the race, the oneness of man, the outcoming of the present from the past, are not to be made the excuse for the crushing out of individual expression, for the suppression of differentiation, by the pseudo-sociologists of the modern state nor of the state that may succeed the present political organization. The gentlemen who so much delight to adjure us to remember that we are what we are because the race has a past conveniently forget the other side of the story; they forget to state that we are what we are also because the pseudo-sociologists of the eons gone failed to cast the future in the outworn forms of the past. Every new integration was the outcome of disintegration. Old biological and social forms dissolved and as they dissolved there blossomed into life new forms. Man is here because of change, of differentiation, of repudiation of the unfit old, of rebellion against the customary. He would today be in the sea-slime along with other forms whose ancestors could not change if his ancestors had not struck out for better feeding-grounds and gradually adapted themselves to new conditions of growth. Hands off, gentlemen.

Last October Josephine Knoop was granted a divorce from her husband, Louis J. Knoop, in New York City. He denied the charge made against him by his wife, and brought a counter action, naming Leo Diedrichstein, the actor, as co-respondent. Mrs. Knoop had named Mrs. Sarah Nadel as co-respondent with her husband. On the witness-stand Mrs. Nadel made a full confession and Mrs. Knoop received her decree. The marriage the other day of Mrs. Knoop and Mr. Diedrichstein recalls his famous answers when testifying in the divorce suit.

"If your relations with Mrs. Knoop had been as charged, would you admit it?" asked Knoop's counsel of Diedrichstein.

"I would not," was the actor's reply.

"Would you commit perjury rather than make such an admission?" was next asked.

"I would; gladly cheerfully," was the answer.

"Do you think you would be justified in such a perjury?"

"I do."

We have all heard how one should "perjure himself like a gentleman" to shield the reputation of a woman, and the saying and Mr. Diedrichstein's avowals alike induce thought. Whatever men may have convinced themselves that they think about violations of the marriage code, it is clear that deep down in their consciousness is a conviction that society, argue and bluster as it will, has no right to interfere with a matter so delicate and private as the love of two human hearts. Lying is esteemed a mean and cowardly vice, and yet no person of sense expects men to tell the truth about their relations with women. Society is pledged to mercilessly crush the woman who loves outside its prescribed forms, and yet men, who help compose this same society, will perjure themselves "gladly, cheerfully," in order to save women from the vengeance of this Frankenstein of which they are themselves parts.

Probity in Mayfair.

BY C. F. H.

The Mayfair church gave vaudeville on Christmas eve. A telephone rang at intervals, and the progress of Santa Claus from the north pole to Mayfair was ascertained. The children actually believed that he telephoned at Alaska, Hudson's Bay, Winnipeg and Evanston, and that the real saint came down a cloth chimney and worked a big pump which gave forth oranges. Christianity, which teaches truth telling as a prime essential, thus sets an example to children of deliberate falsehood. The effect on the young when they learn of the deception, must be bad. Still I suppose Santa Claus will be in vogue when I am dead. So will lying.

Ideals in Love.

BY J. WM. LLOYD.

From Emil P. Ruedebusch, Mayville, Wis., I have received a copy of his new book, "The Old and the New Ideal," with a generous invitation to criticise it as I please. I am happy to be able to assure the author that I have seldom read a work on Free Love with such pleasure. While not agreeing with it in every detail, as will appear hereafter, there is hardly a page on which I have not found something to strongly approve. The spirit of the author is admirable. He has evidently taken the greatest pains to be fair and kind; to enter into the motives of the monogamists and do them full justice. There is no sarcasm, rancor or bitterness in the book. I feel under personal obligations to the author. I think that he has clarified my mind on some points, has helped me to round out my philosophy, and I am grateful. The chapter on the "Sense of Shame" is the best essay on the subject I have ever read, and has given me a new idea. I earnestly urge all who are interested in sexual ethics to get this book.

Most writers on Free Love content themselves with cold logic, which, however invincible and valuable for a scientific basis, hardly meets the needs of the case. Love is essentially a matter of feeling, sentiment and emotion, and must be treated as that plane for success. Mr. Ruedebusch has not failed here, but has given more attention than any other writer to the "spiritual" aspects of the question.

Probably he might have gone still further in that direction with profit. We must all remember that the objections to Free Love are more felt than expressed. We must change the feeling about it, and make it recognize certain feelings toward which at present it is indifferent or opposed, if it is to win. We only subdue nature by agreeing with it, and so far as the present ideal is based on human nature and its needs it is invincible. The present ideal would hardly have captured and held so large a part of the human race, for so long a time, had it not been fitted to survive. It meets certain real or supposed needs, and we must do as much and more or we shall not supplant it.

Let us give a hasty glance at some of these needs. Human nature needs sexual gratification; it needs procreation; security for the child and security that the care of the child shall not be shirked by its parents; it likes system and order in love as in other things. Where there is intense love there is a natural desire that it shall be eternal and eternally gratified by its chosen object. Where property in the married partner is recognized, there is a natural desire that that property shall be secure; there is the natural desire for security, permanency and success felt in domestic as in all other ventures. There is the desire to refine, idealize, spiritualize love and ennoble character by it. There is the desire for comradeship with the other sex in everything.

Now it will be observed that the marriage system promises to legally secure every one of these desires, and its ideal promises to spiritually secure them. Here is its strength.

What have we to put up against it?

Many Free Lovers will answer, "Variety." That seems a rather coarse answer, but it is a legitimate one, for, however the fact is blinked, the fact remains that there certainly is a demand in the nature of every one for variety in love and no education can subdue it. But against this answer it may be said, first, that a great many Free Lovers do not recognize variety as legitimate, second, that marriage indirectly provides it. This is startling but, if we look, we shall see that marriage is everywhere accompanied by a recognized and permitted, if abused and shamed, variety. Sometimes it is polygamy, sometimes concubinage, sometimes the kept mistress or the prostitute—always it is there in some form. To be sure it is usually only for the man, but that is all right so long as the man holds the law; and the legally justified wife is always allowed to revenge herself by casting shame and legal penalties on her rivals. Besides in some countries a certain latitude is allowed the wife also. And most marriage systems admit the perfect propriety of Platonic love.

The chief things that Free Love has to offer against marriage are greater liberty for both sexes and greater justice for woman. But until the demand for liberty grows greater than the demand for security, until women care more for justice and selfhood than for devotion and support these will not avail.

I have full confidence that the demands for liberty, selfhood, justice, self-support will increase, and thus that Free Love will have a steady growth and ultimate triumph; and in the meantime we shall be wise if we so prune and purify and perfect our Free Love ideals that the objections to them, spiritual and practical, shall be as few as possible. It is on this line that our author is working and he is doing good work. His purpose is to show how Free Love may be practicalized today without conflict with the law and, still more fundamentally, to break down certain "superstitions" about love and sex. He claims that the trouble in love relations heretofore has been that the fact that they are of many different kinds has not been recognized and one contract has been made to cover all. He claims that sex-love and sex-relations should always be regarded apart and with no reference to other contracts between sexes. With regard to sex he would have all human beings at all times perfectly free and irresponsible, except to their own ideals, and would have no standing contracts whatever, claiming that the natural desire, which alone justified the act, naturally terminates the contract by its own termination. But he claims that men and women could be friends and comrades, co-operators in business ventures, in studies, and in household expenses, in raising families, and in any or all of these could make contracts of a purely business character with no reference to love or sex (which might be as it would) and with the invariable proviso of perfectly private and separate sleeping room, or rather apartments, for each.

The law, he says, takes no heed of aught but sex relations and interferes only with contracts having relation to these. Therefore always keep your sex relations private, and out of your contracts, and you are safe. He furthermore thinks that some of these contracts might be and some of them should be for life. If I understand him aright he considers that comradeship contracts, procreative contracts, and joint-purse contracts, should be for life; says that some of them "necessarily" are such.

There is much practical good sense in the above, but, for my part, I can see no need of any contract being for life. All contracts, I hold, should be dissolvable at the desire of either party, with due regard to responsibility for material losses that might result from such dissolution. Of course, in the matter of parentage, there is a natural and inherent responsibility of the parent to the child outside of and superior to all contracts, which they cannot affect.

Again I am at loss to see how, where there is a family, the evasion of the law is to be accomplished. Sex relations are necessarily "given away" where children are born, and a contract to beget and raise children is a sex contract. If the law in that place takes cognizance of sex relations the parties are at its mercy. I feel pretty sure that in many sections the raising of a family under contract, or without it even, would be construed as common-law marriage and "living together as man and wife."

But to my mind the law is not our worst enemy. It is the "superstition" to which Mr. Ruedebusch alludes but which he does not take into account sufficiently here. In great cities Free Lovers can be pretty secure as to privacy, though even there more or less badgered, but from progressively smaller communities progressively worse treatment will be received. Religious bigotry, marital jealousy, social prejudice, will operate in ostracism, contempt, boycotts, open insult and actual violence, for which redress can seldom be obtained. Those who wish social privileges, respect and pleasures; who depend upon the good will of their neighbors for a living; who wish their children respected and themselves at peace, cannot afford to be Free Lovers even if the law says nothing. I mean open and acknowledged and practical Free Lovers. If you practice Free Love, but by mouth deny it, or, if you avow it as a theory but act as the world does, society will forgive you, but it will not forgive the combination.

As a matter of fact, only those can be Free Lovers today who are exceptionally favorably placed in life, or who are willing to endure whatever martyrdom may be inflicted upon them. And Mr. Ruedebusch has done little, I fear, although I admit he has done something to aid the martyrs. The public, I fear, will be very nearly as hard on "comrades," "friends," "business partners," etc., of opposite sexes, who inhabit the same house, as upon any other "immoral" couples, even if they maintain separate rooms and refuse to affirm or deny sex relations. Of course, those contractors who inhabit different houses and are prudent in outward conduct are all right, and Mr. Ruedebusch's greatest service will consist, I believe, in convincing Free Lovers that love does not always include sex relations, and that separate homes are best, and in forming a public sentiment to that effect. But while Platonic loves are possible, practically very few people are "built that way" and judgment can only be expected by the average standard and precedents. I am sorry I cannot agree with my author that he has made a brilliant discovery here. It seems to me that there are only two courses open to Free Lovers: First, to do as they please, openly, and take the consequences, whatever they may be; or, second, if they wish to be close comrades, or sex-partners, and enjoy average respect and comfort, to go through the outward form o marriage with a private contract of entire liberty; maintaining separate homes and complete individuality in fact under the same roof and under cover of the law; but, at the same time, protesting against marriage as a tyrannical invasion and doing all they prudently can for the cause of Free Love. Of course those who love battle, consistency and devotion will keep in the middle of the road till run over, but Mr. Ruedebusch and I are both trying to find comfortable passage for those who take to the side walk. His plan is the more consistent and mine has the further disadvantage that it needs two partners who can thoroughly trust each other, but, waiving these, I think my plan has all the practical advantages. There is really nothing to be said against the courage or the consistency of a combatant who yields a point under pressure of overwhelming compulsion. And a married Free Lover has actually the advantage of position. He is a protected spy in the enemy's camp, having their ear and able to spread disaffection everywhere in their ranks. He can always plausibly say—"I am no fanatic. I am married because the law compels me to, but really this is not the ideal way," etc., and nobody refuses to listen to his ideal if it is nicely put.

Here then to my mind is the important point just now. We need the highest and most attractive ideals of Free Love that can be made, put forward with eloquence and profound conviction—ideals that meet all the real needs that the marriage ideal promises to meet, and something more. There is much in Mr. Ruedebusch's ideal worth study and his book best explains that. I have an ideal of my own, to which I have have given much thought, which while more elaborate than his and perhaps more intended for ideal society I contend is founded on and truly adapted to human needs.

With the editor's permission I will give this in another article.

Love is not quite willing to accept the judge's mace for his arrow. When the law no longer supplies husband or wife with a cage, each must look to find and make available what resources he or she has for holding what has been won. We may then look for sober second thoughts both before and after marriage. Love, from so long having bandaged eyes, will be all eye. Every real attraction will be stimulated when al depends upon real attraction. . . . . From the hour when a thought of obligation influences either party to it, the marriage becomes a prostitution.—Moncure D. Conway.

Trip to Cleveland.

On New Year's eve Lucifer's scribe boarded the Nickle Plate train for the Forest City, arriving in time to eat a New Year's dinner with friends at the home of one of the Light-Bearer's most faithful friends and helpers, Elizabeth H. Russell, on Sayle street.

Sunday forenoon was spent at the Children's Progressive Lyceum, one of the oldest and most successful of all the organizations of that name in this country. Its conductor at present is Mr. Copeland, who kindly invited the writer to address the Lyceum. Our old friend Thomas Lees is one of the most active promoters of this educational movement, and was for many years its conductor in this city.

In the afternoon I again had the pleasure of meeting the Franklin Club, and was very cordially invited to take part in discussing the "eight hour" movement, a paper on which subject was read by Mr. Bond. The general drift of both paper and comments thereon was against legislation as a cure for existing evils.

All attempts to secure protection against capitalistic greed by legislation has hitherto proved useless and worse than useless. Either in the law itself, or in the administration thereof, or in both, the capitalistic employer has managed to get his interests protected while the worker has been robbed of his earnings and of his natural right to the use of nature's materials and opportunities.

The speaker of the evening, in his closing remarks, sanctioned the saying that all the good laws that have been enacted for the past hundred years are those that repealed previous enactments, and that the best thing to be done is to continue the repealing process until all were wiped off the statute books. That all laws are class laws, granting privileges to some that are not allowed to others, and all were or are made the occasion of corruption and the excuse for despotism and degradation of the classes in whose interest they were ostensibly enacted. Protection protects none except those who need no protection. Among other instances mentioned was that of protection to bankers and money monopolists by making one commodity the basis of legal tender money!

On next Sunday afternoon the club will discuss the "Social Problem—Liberty, Love, Wisdom—Man's True and Only Saviors."

While waiting at the depot on New Year's Eve I fell into conversation with an old Indianian who was returning from Dakota to visit friends at his old home. He had bought land two years ago in the famous Red River Valley, paying, or promising to pay twenty-five dollars an acre to a "land company" for the privilege of making a home on unimproved land for himself and family. The conversation ran something like this:

"You say you bought land on the 'crop plan'? What do you mean by that?"

"I mean that I promise to give half my crop, or the proceeds thereof, as payment to the land company till the price, twenty-five dollars an acre, is paid."

"But what right has the 'land company' to compel you to pay this money? What did they pay for their title?"

"O, I suppose they bought it of the government for about fifty cents an acre."

"I see! But don't you think twenty-five dollars a pretty high price to pay for unimproved land?"

"O, yes; certainly it is. But what is a poor man to do that wants a home of his own? Better give half your crop for a term of years than give it all to the land holder, as is often done here in Indiana and Illinois, and then have to run away in the night to prevent the same landlord from levying on your team and wagon to pay the difference between the value of the crop and the cash rent."

So then, thought I, this is what "protection" means. The government is custodian of the public land, to see that the strong do not rob the weak of their equal right to the earth, from which the means of living must be drawn, and upon which homes must be built in which to live. A few questions were also suggested by this incident, such as,

How many object lessons like this will yet be necessary to convince the stupid masses that ours is not a government of the people, by and for the people, but a government of the classes, by the classes and for the classes?

How many more such lessons will be necessary to prove to the robbed and disinherited multitude that governments never were invented for their benefit but to enable the parasitic drones of human society to rob the workers without danger to themselves?

How many more such legalized robberies will be required to cause the robbed to lose confidence in and respect for the thing, the machine, called government?

How many ages of suffering will it take to convince the average citizen that Burke was right when he said of man-made government—"Talk not to me of the abuses of government; the thing, the thing itself, is the abuse."

Emerson said, "The good man will not obey the laws too well," and Jefferson said, "That government is best which governs least," but our rulers would have us believe that he is the best man who obeys the laws best, and that that government is best that governs most.

The remedy, as seen from Lucifer's standpoint, lies in the elimination of "government by authority," and the substitution of an agency whose only function is the defense of the citizen against invasion; and in building up a sentiment that teaches, "everyone has the right to do as he wills so long as he does not invade the equal right of others."

The weather in Cleveland since my arrival three days ago has been mild, almost spring-like, and thus far my visit has been a delightful one. As to how soon I shall return to the office will depend much upon prospects for business here. The Buckeyes have as yet but little more cause to congratulate themselves over the election of their "favorite son," than have the people of other states. The papers say the newly-elected American king is now in Cleveland enjoying a holiday visit with his political manager, Mark Hanna, but he did not bring with him the wave of prosperity promised by the said Hanna. Perhaps he is keeping it back until "inauguration" day, so that he may get the full credit thereof.

Womanhood and Manhood in Freedom

BY S. C. CAMPBELL.

Womanhood and manhood are, were, and always will be, more important than motherhood and fatherhood, and will be universally so considered in the land of freedom, the heaven on earth that is to be, when we shall have outgrown the mistakes of the past, mistakes for which the church is mainly if not wholly responsible.

Were womanhood and manhood sufficiently near perfection, motherhood and fatherhood would take care of themselves. For this reason, how to develope womanhood and manhood is the place to begin, and not with motherhood alone. Before motherhood and fatherhood will in the least degree be right in the land of freedom to which the race is journeying, woman and man must be physically and mentally capable of bringing into being physically and mentally sound children. In order to have a nearer perfect womanhood and manhood, woman and man must know, among a great many other things, that there is a higher, a much more important use for sex association than that of begetting offspring. An association free from a liability to beget offspring, but conducive to physical and mental development. (See "Sex Ethics," and "Talks on Nature.")

[Replying briefly to the above I would say,

Follow Nature!

The child is father of the man.
The child is mother of the woman.
Childhood is before adulthood, and Motherhood is before childhood.

It would seem then, that, following nature's teaching, how to develope motherhood "is the place to begin," and not with "womanhood and manhood," and that

With motherhood "sufficiently near perfection," womanhood and manhood would "take care of themselves."

It would follow then, that the writers from whom Mrs. Campbell draws the above thoughts have begun at the wrong place.

Without good motherhood we cannot have good childhood, and without good childhood we cannot have good womanhood and good manhood.

Paraphrasing the saying of Paul:

And now abideth adulthood, childhood, motherhood; these three, but the greatest of these is motherhood.

In the order of natural development first comes discontent with the present; then desire for something better; then the ideal of what that something would be; then the effort to obtain that better something; then the realization of the better.

Following this order: Mothers must first be discontented with the result of their creative work; then must come the desire for better children; then the ideal of what better children would be like; then the effort to practicalize that ideal; then the realization; the incarnation of that ideal in the children of the future—children that will be as much superior to the children of the present as the Belmont or Pearmain apple is superior to the wild crab, or the finest double rose of the florist to the dog-rose of the fields and woods.

As to what is the highest and best use of "sex association" there must always be difference of opinion, but there should be no difference as to the right of women and men to learn all that can be learned, by experiment and by comparison of ideas, in regard to this vitally important matter, and the men who make and enforce laws to perpetuate ignorance of the forces and methods of nature in the production of life, and the conservation of health through the right use of sex-power, these men are themselves the worst of criminals, because the enemies of progress—the enemies of the improvement and the happiness of mankind through an enlargement of the field of knowledge.

Illustrations of Incoherence by Mr. Chavannes.

BY E. C. WALKER.

Albert Chavannes says that my reply to his previous article reminds him of the time when the communications that appeared in the reform papers "were more remarkable for earnestness and fire than for coherence of thought." Thanks! But as the coherence thus lacking was not "necessary," I suppose that Mr. Chavannes enjoyed the controversies. I am unable, therefore, to see why the gentleman should try to "make a little clearer" his own views on the question. His effort in that direction would seem to indicate that, while incoherence is "necessary" to secure "other things which are desirable," coherence is still more necessary, which is the sum of my contention. I congratulate my opponent upon his progress; if he keeps on he may at last get both feet on the coherent platform. My position is that, while incoherence and rattlesnakes are facts in nature, and therefore "necessary" in the course of evolution, man is better off without either. I am sorry that Mr. Chavannes regrets the necessity he is under of paying for what he wants. As the alternative of his paying for the satisfaction of his wants is the imposition of the burden upon some one else, his desire to personally enjoy without paying would seem to show a moral obliviousness that is as deplorable as it is unexpected.

In his fourth and fifth paragraphs Mr. Chavannes describes the difficulties which he met in passing from a belief in special creation to acceptance of the evolutionary principle. He also therein points out the fact that scientific thinkers are not agreed on all points. All that he says here is true, but of course it does not go to show that the incoherence of transition is desirable, per se, nor that the man who remains in that incoherent state of mind is better qualified to teach his fellows than is the man who more or less quickly passes into the domain of comparative coherence. If it did, then, as I said before, the lunatic would be our ideal teacher. The child is incoherent—it is "necessary" that he should be so—but we do not think that condition of mind so desirable that we give our rewards to the least progressive pupils. Mr. Chavannes' whole struggle upward into or toward the region of intellectual clearness, as he has outlined it himself, shows that he does not believe that confusion of thought is so desirable as lucidity of thought. Then, the reader will naturally ask, why in the name of good sense did he spring into the breach in defense of the "incoherence of transition"? That is a question that no man can answer. There is no more occasion to defend incoherence of thought than there is to defend cruelty and many other "facts" of nature, which were "necessary" merely because they were. Explain confused cogitation, we may profitably; defend it, is worse than a waste of breath. We want just as little of it as we can have; the less we have the more rapid and certain our progress.

Our beliefs result from the examination of evidence and the thought thereby induced. Mr. Chavannes says that "the power to investigate and accept subordinate beliefs that are not coherent with the other beliefs that we possess, is that which enables us to change." But will there be further change if the mind is so constituted that it is satisfied with its incoherence? These men with narrow logical minds—Is it true that they are so severely consistent? My observation tells me that they are generally the most inconsistent of men—as, for instance, the modern Christian, who cannot accept new thoughts, but whose conduct is a flat and flagrant denial of the validity of the dogmas he accepts. The man who continues to grow is the man who is persistently striving to rid himself of incongruous beliefs, to become coherent in thought and consistent in action.

Mr. Chavannes need not have troubled himself to defend those who have stepped upon his bridge of transition; the work to be done is to convince them that that is not a safe stopping-place. In order to induce the child to come on into the field of the higher mathematics it is not "necessary" to defend its blunders in addition and common fractions. The wise teacher will point out its mistakes instead of telling the child that they are "necessary." In a word, it is folly to foster false reasoning by showing that it is inevitable that fallible beings will sometimes reason fallaciously. Even Mr. Chavannes undoubtedly would prefer that the man he was trying to instruct in the doctrine of happiness exhibit brightness and clearness of mind rather than dullness and confusion. He wants his "bridge" to be as short as possible. What he takes for a bridge, I think is a swamp, and that it hinders instead of helps the pilgrim.

No, Mr. Chavannes, I do not believe that logic is necessarily the equivalent of truth. In fact, they have no immediate necessary relation. A man may be logical and neither truthful nor just. It is easily possible to reason logically from false premises. What I maintain is that coherence of thought is helpful in all the relations of life; that it hastens the advance in intelligence of the man and of the race, and is therefore one of the greatest aids in happiness. Coherence of thought, clearness of thinking, must tend to make less and less the sum total of that false reasoning that proceeds logically from a faulty premise or illogically from a sound premise.

Coherence results from the effort to correctly classify the phenomena of the universe. Hence all progress is the outcome of the attempt to get away from incoherence. In his "First Principles," Herbert Spencer has thus defined evolution:

"Evolution is an integration of matter and concomitant dissipation of motion; during which the matter passes from an indefinite, incoherent homogeneity to a definite, coherent heterogeneity; and during which the retained motion undergoes a parallel transformation."

Chavannes says that the more incoherence we have the better for humanity; Spencer says that humanity itself is the fruit of coherence, or of the effort to reach coherence. The more coherent matter is, says the synthetic philosopher, the farther evolution has progressed. The less coherence we have, says the philosopher of happiness, the more rapidly evolution will carry us onward. We are passing, says Spencer, from incoherent homogeneity to coherent heterogeneity. If this be true, then what we call inorganic matter is comparatively incoherent and man, the highest form of organic matter, is comparatively coherent. But Mr. Chavannes asseverates that incoherence is preferable to coherence, and if we agree with him we must conclude that we would be happier if we were inorganic matter, if we had not passed from a state of "indefinite, incoherent homogeneity to a definite, coherent heterogeneity." In truth, Mr. Chavannes mistakes the obstacles we have to overcome in the march upward for the stepping-stones of progress. Coherence is order, and order is the handmaid of happiness.

To free love from thorns and thistles, to heal its wounds, to restore it, to ennoble it, to make it sublime, the fecund nest of joy and gymnasiarch of virtue, one thing alone will suffice, a little sincerity.—Mantegazza.

A New Standard of Morals.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

The daily press is devoting some attention to the disappearance and supposed suicide of Hubert Crackenthorpe, a young English story writer, who belonged to the "Decadent" school.

I have not read any of his stories, but the New York World" says they were "horrible, indecent, and gave every evidence of a diseased mind." We must accept the "World's" verdict, as it makes a specialty of horrible stories in its Sunday "Magazine," in which this comment appears.

The last seen of the young man was when he called on Grant Allen, "in the company of a young lady not his wife." The "World" says, "Mr. Grant Allen was so shocked by the state of the case that he was very cool to his young friend. This is rather inconsistent on the part of a man who has done as much as any other by his writings to corrupt the youth of Britain." Of course it is probable that Grant Allen's coolness of demeanor existed only in the imagination of the newspaper correspondent. But what a wonderful standard of morals this is, to be sure! According to this writer, it is improper for a man to call on a friend in company with a young woman, unless they have their marriage license engraved on their cards with their names.

To live up to the new ethical rule, a marriage ceremony must invariably precede a call, an invitation to the theater, or to any other place where men and women accompany each other. What an upheaval of society this involves! It will be interesting to watch the new crusade inaugurated by the "World."

Sociologic Lesson. No XXV.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

Co-operative Errors. The advantages of co-operation are so great that even errors hold their sway by their union long after singly they would have succumbed. They are like the links of a chain supporting each other; and so when one gives way, a multitude of others fall with it. Often a relative truth, a principle which is only true in its adaptation to environment, serves to anchor a raft of errors, until advancing development sweeps it away, and the errors are abandoned. The question to be considered, in looking far into the future, is not adaptation to present circumstances, but to the advanced circumstances of the time; and on every step of the way there must be adaptation to existing circumstances, or the masses of the people will not acquiesce. The majority of the people now are unprepared for reorganization; and what is needed now is to learn their deficiencies, and to improve existing conditions as far as possible so as to educate them in the respects in which they are wanting. Egoism has been excessive; altruism needs cultivation; but justice, the connecting link between the two, is the greatest need; for it looks to the interests of others while not neglecting our own interests. No plan of co-operation can permanently succeed, which is not under the control of men who are thoroughly honest and just.

Almost Another "Mysterious" Tragedy.

BY L. H.

Much has been said concerning the incredibility of two people, in the possession of their senses, dying from the effects of gas without calling for help. But, as Mr. Walker stated last week, "Such accidents are very numerous and this attracts our attention and provokes our inquiry only because the victims were known and loved by us,"—and, I would add, The attention of the daily press was so largely given to this tragedy because the victims were known and feared by the enemies of free thought and free action.

An accident very similar to that which caused the death of our friends occured in Bridgeport, Conn., Jan. 4. Miss Cottrell, a typewriter in the office of the Franklyn Typewriter Co., became unconscious and dropped to the floor. The manager, Frank Marshall, hearing the noise in the rear office, went to find the cause, and seeing her lying on the floor stooped to discover if her heart yet beat, when he, too, became unconscious. Their lives were saved by a messenger boy who, coming to the door, discoved them, and raised the alarm. One of the burners in the radiator near Miss Cottrell's desk was not lighted. The accident was caused by poison, not by suffocation. A few lines in the daily papers tell the story. But, had the messenger boy not arrived so opportunely, and had Miss Cottrell and Mr. Marshall been prominent non-conformists, it would have been the Putnam-Collins tragedy over again, and who can doubt that the daily press, far and near, would have heralded the news that there is an epidemic of suicide by gas among the dissenters from [illegible] nal thought and morals?

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXII.

For the first time Imelda's mind was free. She had left Alice sleeping. Not in a dull feverish stupor, constantly interrupted with delirious mutterings but sleeping, actually and really sleeping. And although her breathing was only a gentle fluttering, it was so weak, it was a quiet sleep, and she knew that for a few hours, at least, she could safely trust her to the faithful nurse. So Imelda slept the sleep of the just.

When the morning sunlight streamed through the open window, flooding the room with its bright glory, a servant had softly entered and with deft fingers closed the shutters, darkening the room so that the slumbers of the completely exhausted girl might not be disturbed; the nurse meanwhile remaining faithful and true to her trust. Now and then a maid softly opened the door to listen, but Imelda slept on, and when the doctor came he gave the order to let her sleep by all means, until she should awake of herself. So the hours of the day passed and the evening shades were falling ere that death-like sleep was lifted and Imelda opened her eyes. The deep hush and darkness that prevailed left her for a long time in semi-unconsciousness, a delicious drowsiness folding her in its power, but by and by it passed away, leaving her brain more clear, and presently, all in an instant, she knew and remembered.

But how long had she slept? It was three o'clock when she sought her bed and only two hours before the morning light would appear. It was still dark, yet she did not feel as if she she had slept only a short time, but rather had the sensation of having slept a long while, she was so wide awake, and—yes! she was hungry, very hungry. She reached out her hand for her watch, which she remembered having placed upon the stand near the bedside. It was there, but when she placed it to her ear she made the discovery that it had stopped. Then she struck a light, having a lucifer always within reach. By the flickering flame she saw that her watch had stopped at twenty minutes of two. A puzzled look overspread her face. What did it mean? Just then she thought she heard a footstep outside her door; the next instant the door was softly opened.

"Who is there?" she hastily inquired, her heart giving a bound, as she was not in the habit of leaving her door unlocked. Could she have forgotten it? A soft laugh answered her.

"Is it you, Mary?" she asked, recognizing the voice.

"Yes, Miss Imelda, it is I. Have you decided to return to life? I was beginning to fear you were going to sleep right over into the next world."

"Why, what time is it?" was Imelda's next question, still surprised and puzzled. Again the girl laughed the low, amused laugh.

"Almost eight o'clock."

"Eight o'clock! Why, Mary, you ought to have called me ere this. Mrs. Boswell ought to have been relieved some time ago. But why is it so dark? I thought I had the windows open."

"So you had. I made free to close them but will open them now," saying which the girl unfastened and opened the shutters. Instead of the bright sunshine, as Imelda had expected, only a hazy twilight filled it with dim shadows.

"What does this mean?" she stammered. "Why, it is quite dark. Did not you say that it is almost eight o'clock? She was growing impatient. Mary's laugh again rang through the room.

"Yes," she said "it is eight o'clock, not in the morning but in the evening."

Imelda was sitting bolt upright in bed now.

"What! Do you mean to say that I have slept all day through?"

"Just that, and nothing else."

"O, that was wrong! I ought to have been called long ago. How is——" She stopped, a sudden fear holding her tongue a prisoner.

"Mrs Westcot is getting better,"—supplementing the unfinished question and answering it at the same time. "She, like yourself, has been sleeping all day."

"And Mrs Boswell——?"

"Has also had a nap while I sat and watched with Mrs. Westcot, and now if you will rise and dress I will prepare you some——breakfast," and laughing again she disappeared leaving Imelda to her own reflections, but first having lit the gas overhead. No hesitation now. Hastily she arose and quickly made her toilet. Donning a wrapper she twisted the dark hair into a shining coil, and in a few minutes descended to the dining room where Mary had spread for her a tempting meal.

Imelda was a favorite with the servants, who were always willing to do a favor for this fair girl from the west, who was so considerate. It was well known that Mrs Westcot was also from the western metropolis, and they often wondered if people in the west generally were so kind and considerate. It would have been impossible for the gentle-hearted Alice to assume aristocratic airs, therefore she could always depend upon her servants, and all hearts were filled with fear while the gentle mistress was raving of real or fancied woes, and when at last, after weary weeks, the crisis was over, it was as if a heavy cloud had passed away, and the gloomy faces were bright with smiles.

Having done ample justice to the generous repast, and feeling much refreshed, Imelda sped to the chamber above. Softly she opened the door and moved to the bedside. Mrs. Boswell was sitting with her elbow resting upon the bed, her head upon her hand. She never moved as Imelda stepped to her side. Bending down she found that the nurse was fast asleep. A pang smote her that while she, in the strength of youth, had slept the day away the much older woman had continued at her post. True, Mary had said that she had relieved her for awhile, but Imelda knew that she, like herself, needed a good long rest, and she decided that she should have it. Seeing that Alice too was sleeping, she gently touched Mrs. Boswell on the shoulder and slightly shaking her the nurse awoke with a start. Imelda held up a warning finger to prevent her from making an outcry. But the woman was frightened. She felt guilty at having been found asleep at her post of duty. Hastily reaching for her watch she breathed a sigh of relief.

"Only ten minutes," she whispered. "She has been sleeping so long," indicating Alice, "that I suppose the quiet has overpowered me."

"And no wonder," said Imelda,—"you are certainly in need of rest. I will now take your place while you sleep all night and all day tomorrow, too, if you wish. So just give me the directions for tonight, and then away to you couch." The woman smiled.

"Thank you. I am only too glad to accept." After giving the proper directions she added: "And now if you will excuse me I will accept your kind offer and sleep. Mary took my place for several hours or I fear I could not have held out. In the morning I will be ready to take my place again."

So the nurse withdrew and left Imelda alone with her sick friend, and as she largely imitated the example of the young girl and slept until the afternoon of the next day. Imelda had a long watch before her.

But we are forestalling. While the nurse has gone to recruit her strength in sleep we will remain with Imelda and follow the outline of her thoughts as she watched her sick friend. Over three weeks have now passed since the promenade of the lovers in the moonlight under the silver maples,—the evening after that on which for the first time she had discarded her mourning garments, when they had spent two happy hours together. Imelda adroitly avoiding a repetition of the pleadings of the night before. She was happy, and was willing that Norman should know it. He in turn had been content to drink the kisses from the dewy lips and leave the morrow to take care of itself.

Since that evening Imelda had seen but little of her lover.

If he came in the evening she scarcely ever had longer than a half hour to give him. The cloud that hung above this house was too dark to admit of much happiness or joy for them. On the other hand it did not give them the leisure to discuss the question nearest their hearts, and Imelda did not wish it just now.

Long ere this, had the answer come to the long letter that she had written to Margaret. But not alone in Margaret's delicate tracing had the answer come. A long letter had also come in the bolder handwriting of Wilbur Wallace. Her heart gave a bound as she recognized the hand, while the rich blood rushed in a hot wave to her face dyeing her temples, ears and neck. What would he have to say? With a beating heart she had opened it. Something impelled her to lay Margaret's aside until she first perused Wilbur's letter.

LOVE, MARRIAGE, AND DIVORCE

And the Sovereignty of the Individual.

A Discussion between Henry James, Horace Greely, and Stephen Pearl Andrews. There are here included the final replies of Mr. Andrews, refused by the New York Tribune, and a subsequent discussion, occurring twenty years later, between Mr. James and Mr. Andrews.

"The great lesson for the world to learn is that HUMAN BEINGS DO NOT NEED TO BE TAKEN CARE OF. What they do need is such conditions of justice and freedom and friendly co-operation that they can take care of themselves. Provided for by another, and subject to his will as the return tribute, they pine, and sicken, and die. This is true equally of women as of men; as true of wives as it is of vassals or serfs. Our whole existing marital system is the house of bondage and the slaughter-house of the female sex. Whether the evils are inherent or incidental, whether they belong to the essence or the administration of the institution, whether they are remediable without or only by means of revolution, are the questions that now have to be discussed."

Equal Brotherhood.

They tell me, Liberty! that, in thy name,
I may not plead for all the human race:
That some are born to bondage and disgrace,
Some to a heritage of woe and shame,
And some to power supreme, and glorious fame.
With my whole soul I spurn the doctrine base,
And as an equal brotherhood, embrace
All people, and for all fair freedom claim!

O! not for Afric's sons alone I plead,
Or her descendants: but for all who sigh
In servile chains, whate'er their caste or creed:
They not in vain to Heaven send up their cry;
For all mankind from bondage shall be freed,
And from the earth be chased all forms of tyranny.

Life, Health, and Longevity.

Moses Harman, in "Our New Humanity."

Not as a dogmatist, not as a Gnostic—"one who knows," nor as an Agnostic—"one who does not know," but rather as a "Skeptic," that is, "one who inquires," one who is willing to be taught and anxious to learn,—would I approach the Temple of Truth, the Temple of Nature, the Temple of Life. Reverently, and yet with no feeling of self abasement—such as an inferior is expected to feel in the presence of a superior; nor with fear, such as a creature is supposed to feel in presence of his creator, but rather with confidence, self-respect and self-reliance, as recognizing myself an integreal part of the great whole, recognizing myself as a microcosm in the macrocosm—with such feelings I would approach this particular investigation. With such feelings, and with the lights before me—with the lights within me and around me I give it as my honest conviction that there is purpose in Nature, there is purpose in Life, and that purpose is simply the evolution of

LIVING ORGANISMS.

This seems tantamount to saying that life is its own object or purpose. The development, the perfection, the aggrandizement, the glorification of life, through and by organization in the vegetable, the animal, the psychic, and—shall I say it?—the spiritual, this so far as my limited vision can reach, is the object and purpose of Nature, of Life in the universal.

Inasmuch, however, as the proof of the existence of psychic and spiritual forms, belongs to the realm of the occult, rather than to that of the physical senses, I prefer not to take the time of the reader nor the space of the magazine in further consideration of this much disputed question but will proceed at once to speak briefly of some of the more visible, palpable and indisputable relations that connect us, as human beings, with life, or with animate nature.

In common with other mammalia, the human animal is possessed of several co-ordinate and subordinate systems, organisms, semi-independent, and yet mutually dependent systems. The first of these, in the order of development, is the digestive and assimilative system, the chief organ of which is the stomach.

The process of digestion and assimilation of food for the growth and sustenance of the body, begins in the mouth. This important organ, as its first and perhaps most important use is a mill to grind the food and prepare it to be acted upon by the first digestive fluid called the saliva, secreted from the blood by glands located convenient for emptying into and mixing with the food during the process of grinding, called mastication. When sufficiently ground and mixed with saliva a little hand, placed in the back part of the mouth, seizes the food and pushes it down the œsophagus, the name applied to the upper end of the long tube called the alimentary canal.

This is the first step in the process of digestion, and if not properly performed it is but reasonable to infer that the subsequent steps will not be well done. William E. Gladstone is reported as saying that much of the exceptional health and vigor enjoyed by him at the advanced age of fourscore and more, is due to the fact that he uniformly makes two dozen bites for every morsel of food taken into the mouth.

The second step in the process of digestion is performed in and by the stomach, which is simply a sack-like enlargement of the alimentary canal. If the mouth is the mill the stomach is the kitchen of the digestive process. For its use there is another fluid prepared,—secreted only when food is present, or when the mind dwells upon the idea of eating—called the gastric juice. This fluid is emptied into the stomach which, when food is present, proceeds to mix it with the food by what is called the peristaltic or churning movement. The result of this mixing is a milky looking compound called chyme which is then allowed to pass through the door or gate called the pylorus, at the lower or farther end of the stomach.

As evidence that the stomach—sometimes personified and called "Sir Gastric"—has intelligence of its own, is the fact that when hard substances present themselves at the pyloric exit, the gate instantly closes and the chunk of food or indigestible matter, is made to pass the round again to give the gastric juice more time to dissolve it. If, however, after repeated or long continued effort the stomach fails to dissolve what the mill failed to properly grind, the pylorus is opened and the stomach sends the unwelcome substance into the next department of the alimentary canal, called the duodenum, or second stomach.

Another evidence of such unconscious or sub-conscious intelligence is the fact that, under normal conditions, when the mill, or mouth, has sent down enough food for the wants of the animal organism, there is a sudden contraction of the upper opening of the stomach—a peremptory command, so to speak, not to send down any more food till further orders. If this command is not heeded, however, and if in obedience to an abnormal appetite, or to please the host or hostess who says,

"Why, you don't mean to say you have eaten all you can! Come, come, 'never say die'! Just try our plum-pudding, our pie"—or other tempting dessert—then poor Sir Gastric is compelled to submit—passively he submits and gives no further warning—as much as to say to the conscious intelligence, the will-power, supposed to be located in the brain:

"Well, sir! I have done my duty, and now the consequences of surfeit rest with you. If you want to kill yourself and all the rest of your sub-conscious helpers you can do so, but the blame of such calamity will not rest with me."

And just here is probably as good a place as any to say that of all the errors, of all the mistakes, incident to this our transition state, our long and painful passage from the plane of brute intelligence, and brute instinct,—the plane of unconscious or sub-conscious intelligence, to what we call the higher or human plane,—the plane of conscious or rational intelligence,—the most hurtful of all these mistakes is that of

OVER-EATING!

Brute beasts, when not enslaved by man, seldom if ever are guilty of the vice of over-eating. Neither does their unconscious intelligence often mislead them in the selection of the right kind of food. It is left to man to do this. Man alone makes this stupid blunder, and the results of these two errors—over-eating and use of unhealthy or indigestible food, are pain, disease, debility, premature old age and premature death.

Man, in his pride of superior intelligence, could learn much from his elder but despised brothers, the brute beasts.

The best guide in the selection of food—and the same may be said of drink—is doubtless the unperverted, the uneducated appetite, which appetite is the voice of the indwelling life—the voice of nature; the object, the purpose, of which voice is simply the growth and preservation of the animal form. Whether the visible animal form is or is not the outer manifestation or covering of an invisible living form, sometimes called the psychic body, the astral body, the soul, or spiritual body, is a question upon which there is much difference of opinion among equally honest and equally capable investigators.

The study of the digestive system and its functions, the question as to what kinds of food and drink are best adapted to the well-being of the visible animal body, and of its possible psychic counterpart, is one of deep interest to all who deem life worth living—all who prefer health and longevity to disease and early death.

The agitation of the Food question, or Food and Drink question, has doubtless done good; has done something towards correcting the errors into which our perverted animal instincts have led us, but that some of the most earnest and intelligent of our modern teachers of hygiene have been blessed with more zeal than knowledge is doubtless true. I will mention only a few of what seem to me serious errors. For instance:

The Vegetarian reform and reformers. That the use of flesh as food is often the cause of disease and of premature death is doubtless true, but that it is so generally hurtful to the body, so vitiating to the intellect, and so demoralizing to the emotional and the psychic nature of the human animal, as some of these reformers tell us, seems not to be borne out by the facts. It is part of the weakness of human nature to oscillate from one extreme to the opposite. Having seen the evil of excessive flesh-eating in one's own case, and in that of friends, we jump to the conclusion that the use of animal food is always injurious. We fail to remember, always, that the human animal is a microcosm—embodying or incarnating the characteristics of all the provisional orders, genera and species of animal life, and that food that is normal and proper for one person may not be such or another; also what is proper or best at one stage of life is not so for another.

One of the evils incident to an exclusive diet of, or free use of, cereals, legumes, potatoes and other starchy foods in the early ossification of the arteries, thereby bringing on premature decrepitude, premature loss of memory and other mental faculties—early old age and untimely death. This result is doubtless caused by the calcareous or earthy matters contained in these substances, of which matters flesh meats, nuts, milk and eggs contain very little.

Fruits and nuts seem to constitute the ideal food for the adult human, as milk is the natural provision for the infant mammal, but we cannot at once, or in one generation, get away from our heredity—or get the mastery over our heredity—sufficiently to discard flesh meat and starchy foods, and yet exhibit the vigor of body and mind we could and would possess while judiciously and temperately making use of a mixed diet.

Experience is the only sure guide. I once heard O. S. Fowler say that for fifteen years of his life he was a strict vegetarian, but that he was at length obliged—by the loss of vigor, mental as well as physical, to return to a mixed diet.

Motherhood in Freedom.

COMMENTS BY ALBERT CHAVANNES.

In answer to Friend Harman's demand for criticism and opinions about his pamphlet, I send a few words, giving some of my views on this important question.

On one point, I am perfectly agreed with the author. I believe that the way to hereditary improvement lies through freedom of the individual. While upon some economic questions, I do not agree with Mr. Harman, and believe that a certain amount of coercion exercised by society is best for the progress of humanity, I believe also that so far as the hereditary forces are concerned, it is upon individual intelligence and action that we must rely for the improvement of the human race.

But granted that the mother must be free to achieve the best results, I am not prepared to say that the lines of action proposed in that little pamphlet are the best at all times and under all circumstances, and I am much more inclined to believe that the best advice we can give to the prospective mother, is to follow that line of action which satisfies her best.

My first advice would be for no woman to enter upon the task of maternity unless the thought of so doing gave her pleasant sensations. Then, if for her own sake she decides to become a mother, let her seek for her partner a man who is attractive to her, and let the attraction be physical and sexual more than intellectual. Then, when she is impregnated, if she is satisfied with her mate, let her seek no further, but if on the other hand, she desires for the society of other men, let her seek for it, and enjoy it to her full capacity.

But another point is to be considered, and if I was to criticise Mr. Harman, it is in that he has failed to state that the co-operation of the man must be as free as that of the woman. It must be a free and mutual partnership where giving and receiving are alike pleasurable, for I have held for a long time that the best way to improve the race is for the parents to seek for those conditions which make for their own satisfaction.

And right here is the difference I make between economi and sexual co-operation. Experience has shown that in economics, a certain degree of coercion has often very good results. For instance, if a majority of the citizens of a city see proper to pass sanitary measures, and a majority refuses to obey them, coercion on the part of the majority will benefit the whole city, and I approve of it. But experience shows also that in the sexual relation, coercion always fails of its object, and on that account I am opposed to it.

This statement will explain to many of my friends why, while I am a strong advocate of freedom in the home and in the domestic relations, I advocate the increase of government control in many other directions.

While I am on this subject of heredity there is another side of this question which I want to bring to the notice of you readers. The example of the improvements made by stock breeders is often given to show what could be done for the human race. But there is a wide difference that ought to be noted. We improve stock, not for their own sake, but for our benefit, while the human race must improve itself for its own benefit.

We breed some horses to draw heavy loads, others to trot speedily, others for general farm work. In cattle we improve some for milk, others for butter, others for beef. In sheep we breed for mutton or wool.

It is very clear to my mind that we cannot do the same thing for men and women. We cannot breed some women for cooks, others for school teachers, others for milliners, nor men for doctors, farmers or blacksmiths. I can see but one thing we can do; we can breed for health.

Now the result of all my studies is that the best way at present to breed for health, is to breed out—stop reproducing—diseases. Looking as I do upon drunkenness, insanity, nervousness, consumption, etc., as inherited diseases, I believe it perfectly possible to breed them out as soon as the race has acquired sufficient intelligence and sufficient individual freedom.

But here comes the difficulty. All these diseases are generated anew by the present economic conditions, and as fast as we breed them out, the defective surrounding will reproduce them. What we build with one hand, we destroy with the other.

On that account, I hold that the work of improving the economic conditions is just as necessary as the work of increasing the amount of individual freedom and the knowledge of hereditary laws.

I fully sympathise with Moses Harman and the work of Lucifer, but I do not believe that the portion of the field he has selected is of more importance than any other. As I look at it, progress is a very complex machine, all parts of which are banded and held together, and no one portion can travel any faster than the others. The best we can do, in my estimation, is not to work in that part that we think the most important, but in that part for which we find ourselves the best fitted, which is usually the kind of work we find the most satisfaction in doing.

It is in fact what most all the reformers are doing; the pity of it is that too many think that they are carrying the world on their shoulders.

Is the Narrowest Selfishness to be Eulogized as a Virtue?

BY FLORA.

I am glad Aunt Elmina gave us an extract from "The Old and New Ideal." I have not yet seen a copy and if that is a fair sample—which I hope it is not,—don't know that I would be much edified or instructed. With all due respect for Aunt Elmina and her opinions, I must everlastingly protest against such erroneous ideas as "The lady friend" voices in the above book. Let us dissect it.

1. "The love of a varietist would bring me joy, but mixed with pain." How does the lady know what the mixture would bring her, as she speaks as one having no experience?

2. "To every gladness he'd create, there'd be an added bane." It generally takes two to create gladness or sorrow, and why put all the responsibility upon him?

3. "The roses he would offer would be full of thorns, and sting me to the quick." This is merely poetical license, the thorns might sting him as quickly.

4. "It would be the inexorable law; though he might kindly lavish much upon me, he'd take my peace of mind." Evidently her piece of mind was taken, or she would excuse herself from mourning its peaceful loss!

5. "And why?" asks this bundle of flesh and bones, inconsistency and utterly useless loveliness. "Because I'm so constituted that when others receive the same, the gift decreases for me." Now here's constitutional egotism in a sextuple compounded dose! Evidently she values herself for all she's worth—"roses with thorns that sting," and "gifts!" She ought to get a corner upon the pure air, sunshine, colors, landscapes, clear cool water, light and life, because these are so common and may be enjoyed by millions!

That little lady has not begun to learn the a, b, c's of nature's boundless possibilities of growth in freedom. She will find that the love that is enduring and ennobling exists only between equals, and there is no cheating, possible.

"Love comes unasked, may be unsought,
In equal exchange of worth and thought,
But it never can be forced or bought."

There never was an iniquitous institution but what its beneficiaries strenuously objected to an investigation and to criticism.—Altgeld.

Some Thoughts on Prenatal Influence.

BY IDA BALLOU.

It is a subject not wholly new and yet one upon which I have never been accustomed to dwell much. The many sides of the question seemed so diverse and conflicting that I had set it aside as one upon which more conjecture was lost than facts established. And now this little incident occuring so near by, has started these thoughts into a different channel.

I knew of his life and the facts attending it before birth and after; long before I really became acquainted with his individuality. And not until his sudden death did I see, as clearly as if painted out by some visible means, the plainly established fact that the failure which so sadly attended his broken career was but the inevitable sequence of the conditions bearing upon his development before birth.

It would take too long to enumerate the many little evidences of the unhappy and uncongenial temperaments of the house hold into which he was born, and the total lack of home education that had made him capricious and vacillating—as he was universally known by his friends, "fickle"—and the morbid sensitiveness, inherited from a mother-heart, tortured by the "hurts" inflicted by the hands that some how or other, it was her misfortune to love. It was necessary for her to "abstract" from her "liege lord," her necessary portion during gestation; so her "boy," when still at a childish age, had to "work out a term," in a reformatory to satisfy Nature's inexorable rule.

"He was born accursed," one of his friends had said, and the expression embodies the whole sad truth. Education would, however, have helped him. Had his mother been a thoughtful woman, free from superstition, his body would not rest in an unmarked grave, today. She had evolved out of the "god-idea," and declared her independence from wearing corsets, but she did not realize that it would be possible to live without her "husband," or that marriage was other than a life sentence.

She realized that it had all been a mistake, and she made the still graver mistake of thinking it impossible to remedy it. Nor did she realize that every child born under such conditions is "born accursed."

The common expression, "marking children" is believed in by almost every woman, but how many women dream of the possibility of shaping an existence for good or for evil in the life she lives today? "To drag from the depth of painless unconsciousness a being into painful consciousness" is one of the heaviest of responsibilities, and one that receives the least attention. Because this young man, this all-too-apparent victim o mis-spent lives, failed in his ventures and drifted along life's course, some thoughtless people blamed him, and called him "shiftless." Others who liked him, blamed his brutal father, and censured his seemingly careless mother. A little thought and carefully applied logic disproves them all. No one is to blame. His life was simply the outcome of false education and deep-rooted superstition. To me, it illustrated beyond all manner of doubt that prenatal influence is a powerful factor of life, and by it the individual is stamped for success or failure; for a useful or a disappointed career. Just how far it is possible to control this I will leave for others to decide; yet stoutly averring that

"Not those who seem to fail have failed indeed,
What though the seed be cast by the wayside,
And the birds eat it? Yet the birds are fed."

The ancients have us at a disadvantage. They worshipped the supreme being as the father of men and saw no impurity in the symbolism of parentage to indicate the work of creation. What is divine to be and to do can not be immodest and wicked to express. No man born of woman can with decency impugn the operation of that law to which he owes his existence; and he is impious beyond all others who regards that law as only sensual.—*Prof. Alexander Wilder, M. The editor is still in Cleveland, and instead of holding the forms for editorial, as I did last week, I will insert a portion of his article published in "Our New Humanity," for January.

No. 641 was delayed because the forms were changed on the press, and the pages printed wrong, so the forms had to be sent back and the edition printed over again. We hope our friends will overlook this unusual delay. They will receive two numbers almost at the same time.

"Our New Humanity."

The January number of "Our New Humanity" was sent to subscribers last week. The excellence of the intellectual feast it provides for its readers may be judged, in a limited degree, by the following extracts from some of the principal dishes in its "bill of fare."

"The woman of the future will be recognized as the rightful proprietor of her own bedroom. Its keys shall be given into her eternal keeping, and she shall 'open and no man shut, and shut and no man open.' Who shall be admitted into its sacred precincts it will be for her to say, and not for me. But I venture it will be he who approaches with reverent tread; the sound of whose footstep, outside the threshold, sends the rich blood dancing through her happy veins. I would make for true virtue the severest tests. I would institute for it the highest standards. But they are not such as the dark, and degraded, and ignorant, and sensual past has set up. The priests, and legislators, and courts of Christendom, cannot, combined, confer upon a single man the right to touch the hem of a woman's garment irreverently. Woman's highest wisdom, and her sweetest love, and man's most reverent tenderness, is the holy trinity at whose sacred altar I summon you to worship."—From "Woman's Primal Right," by Francis Barry.

"No child of sound mind should be permitted to arrive at the age of puberty without a knowledge of the functions of the sexual organs of man and woman. Such knowledge is a more powerful protection against baleful secret habits and sexual indiscretions than countless thousands of moral lectures in which the nature of the sex functions is shrouded in mystery. 'Thou shalt not' is the language of a master, not of a parent. Instead of forbidding a child to do an injurious act, explain to it clearly the injury which results from such an act. If the explanation is sufficiently clear the curiosity is satisfied and where no command is given there is no temptation to disobey."—From "How to Escape the Curse," by Jonathan Mayo Crane.

"I am fully aware of the defects of the present monogamic marriage, and do not believe that it is conducive to the highest happiness of the individual or to the best social results, but I believe, nevertheless, that it contains elements that are necessary to the perpetuation and improvement of the race, and I think it is a mistake for reformers to fail to recognize these elements and to try to throw overboard marriage as a whole. The march of progress is undoubtedly toward more individual freedom and better social organization, and the improvement of marriage will follow the same lines, and on that account I look upon the changes that tend to the enlargement of the family, as the only ones that will permanently affect the relations of the sexes."—From "Can Marriage be Abolished?" by A. Chavannes.

"Yes, legal marriage may well serve beneficent ends in addition to reproduction, but free association can still better serve all these ends, including that of the production of children, while it is not likely to bring in its train many of the evils that are connected with marriage. Even better than marriage, it can and does strengthen social bonds, knit together new and desirable ties and friendships, and extend culture and refinement. On the other hand, it does not so often, not even frequently, force the lover to accept as part of his 'family' undesirable relatives, it does not tend to make the man a boor and the woman a slattern, and it leaves free to come into the lives of both many elements of growth to which the husband and wife must be strangers. It in no way interferes with a 'long-enduring union of esteem, tender companionship, and reciprocal aid and encouragement'—rather, it renders more easily attainable such an ideal of respect, trust, and happiness—while it is one of its strongest recommendations that it seriously interferes with the formation and the continuance of those convict-unions of mutual indifference, distrust, or hate which abound everywhere that the legal marriage system prevails."—From "Woman's 'Duty' to Bear Children," by E. C. Walker.

"Women, forced into the sexual embrace by unrelenting husbands, protected and aided by the inexorability of the marriage laws, cannot bear normal, healthy and well-developed children, to say nothing of preserving their own health and mental equilibrium in relations so repulsive and loathesome as to be torturing. Since, therefore, the law, the political power, is robbing and pauperizing people (though it is enriching the elect and the select few) and simultaneously forcing them to do things that are bringing into existence a race that can be more easily robbed and pauperized, the first and foremost freedom that we useful—is the freedom not to do. With this freedom all else can be achieved."—From "The Freedom Not to Do," by C. L. Swartz.

"Punishment and preaching, the old remedies for supposed sexual abnormality, are alike wholly inadmissable. The more modern reformatory discipline may do good sometimes, but rarely. On the other hand, it follows from the criterion we have chosen, that giving nature the fullest opportunity to eliminate what she stamps, in so doing, as abnormal, is necessarily and always conducive to race-improvement. Sexual liberty, of the most absolute kind, the removal of all penalties, legal, lynch-legal, and so far as practicable, social, or Grundyish, is the first of scientific sexual regulation."—From "True and False Morality," by C. L. James.

Home Life, Health and Happiness.

Home Life in relation to health and happiness is my subject. When men and women are free from sexual superstitions how will they live? How should they live to obtain the best results? As individuals differ in temperaments and tastes, they will necessarily differ in their methods of seeking happiness, and so we must be prepared to find social radicals occupying diametrically opposite positions as to which is the most desirable form of home life. But I believe that observation and experience have made the great majority of emancipated lovers suspicious of the common home. I have found men and women who are State or Fabian Socialists in economics who are stanch Individualists in regard to domestic arrangements.

One feature of the coming social organization seems to be already fixed. Whether the free man and woman will live in a communistic home, or will keep their business interests separate while dwelling in the same house, or will maintain entirely separate establishments, it can not be doubted that each man and woman and child will have his or her own room. This involves far-reaching economic changes, but they must come before human liberty and dignity can be adequately safeguarded. There must be one place where the man or woman may be intruded upon by no other—where none may enter without the invitation of the occupant, and where any whom the occupant chooses may freely come. This secures woman's initiative when desired. Here will be found that restful solitude which every one craves at times, and here the man, the woman, the child is master, is mistress. No matter how intimate the relations of the persons, neither can come unwelcomed into the presence of the other without invasion, and without making mere frail and uncertain the tenure of their love.

The common home cannot be had without either making the woman more or less of a domestic drudge or introducing assistants who are on a different intellectual plane and who will be spies upon the actions of their employers. Of course some women are perfectly happy in the performance of household labors, but they are not often found within the ranks of the socially emancipated. Progressive women, as well as progressive men, generally desire to make for themselves places in the world, and they chafe under the system that gives them nothing more to do than keep a few rooms clean and cook and wash for the members of small households. The work is very necessary, of course, and there is nothing "low" about it, but it is not, as at present performed, an economical expenditure of force, and it narrows the horizon of women who wish to see beyond the confines of the flat or cottage. Not all women are by nature adapted to this kind of work, any more than all men are fitted for blacksmiths or farmers or lawyers.

Besides, and still more important, the constant association of two persons tends to make prosy, irritating and hateful their mutual life, and rubs off all the bloom of romance and love that should remain to the end of their days. As husband and wife or as lovers in a "free union," living together, they are constantly tempted to assume the attitude of owners and dictators, no matter how broad and free their theories may be, and they must annoy each other in a thousand ways. But as guest and hostess or host they are put upon their good behavior; they are independent; each is supreme in his or her own domicile; each may be alone or have company as suits the mood of the hour and each may have any company that is congenial, without annoying the other by the presence of those whom that other, for any reason, does not like.

With the individual home, free to all friends on invitation, and to those only, undesired solitude would be reduced to a minimum while undesired association would become almost unknown. While some would prefer to do their own cooking and washing, there is no doubt that by far the greater number would find it more economical and pleasant to combine and have their food prepared at one place and their washing done where the best results could be obtained at the least expense. The members of a group could dine at a common table, or break up into sub-groups, or have their meals sent to their rooms. In this way those women—or men—who had a special aptitude for culinary and laundry work could labor where they could use their talents to the best advantage, leaving all other comrades free to do the same. Any work is done best when done willingly, and it will be done willingly only when it is done by those who prefer it to other kinds of labor.

The same general principles apply in the care and education of children. It is a wasteful extravagance for a woman who is an expert in housework or floriculture or bookkeeping or literature but who is not a natural nurse or teacher to devote her entire time to the training of a child or of two or three children. With proper free co-operation the children can be together during the working hours of their mothers and return to them at night, and on days of recreation, if so desired. Put under the charge of efficient nurses and instructors, they will be better cared for and taught than they could be otherwise, and will be company for one another, while learning more quickly than they could do if alone with adults. Such a combination of forces by free men and women would enable many women, amply qualified in every way to be mothers, to have children. I know many free women who intensely desire children, who feel that their health would be better if they could have them, but who realize that, as wage-workers or as persons whose business ventures yield them very small incomes, they cannot afford to assume such responsibilities, for the care of children would take them from their work and lessen or destroy their economic and therefore their sexual independence. In this connection, a Boston friend has suggested the formation of a voluntary mutual motherhood insurance company, each free woman and each free man to pay so much per month into the common treasury to aid such unmarried members as should become mothers. The plan merits serious consideration.

Freedom of thought is valueless if it does not secure for us freedom of action. Health is essential to happiness, and health is not attainable except under conditions that permit full freedom of the sex life. If we wish to be healthy and therefore happy we must strive to emancipate ourselves from the trammels of ignorance and prejudice. If we are wise we will no more refuse the delights of love because they are under the taboo of convention than we will refuse to eat certain foods or on certain days because some church has ordered us not to eat said foods or on said days. If we are rational beings, we will no more abdicate our right to accept and enjoy the friendships and loves that come to us than we will abdicate our right to work or play on the priests' day. We profit by the experiences of the past chiefly by avoiding the mistakes made by those who passed through those experiences. That is the main use of history. It is a danger signal.

Because liberty gives opportunity to grow; because liberty permits us to correct our mistakes; because liberty files the chains that bind us to the dead body of the past; because liberty has worked better than despotism in the fields of religion, politics, and industry—because of all these facts we strive to attain liberty in the fields of morals and love, believing that there as in all other fields of human thought and action, a measure of health and happiness will come to us through liberty that never could be ours through despotism. Generation after generation must pass into oblivion before the race can reach the summits we build in thought, but that need not change us—we can do only the work that lies at our feet, and in doing that we must find our satisfaction in that and in the confidence and love of our fellow workers.

All children born under maternal protest must, in the very nature of things, be unfortunately born, and, if there is any truth in the doctrine of pre-natal influence, undesired children must be unhappy children, cursed with dissatisfied minds and usually handicapped still further with diseased bodies.—Edward B. Foote, M. D.

Another "Morality" Crusade.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

A bill is to be introduced into the New York Legislature providing for the punishment of husbands who are "untrue" to their wives. The punishment is to consist of a fine of from one thousand to five thousand dollars, or an imprisonment of from one to five years. The bill is to be introduced by Senator Ford at the instigation of Mrs. Grannis, Anthony Comstock, Charles H. Parkhurst, and other statute moralists.

It is strange that these agitators cannot see the logical result of their crusade, supposing that the enactment could be enforced against any considerable numbers of "unfaithful" husbands, and the others made "faithful" thereby. This is, of course, an impossible result. But, if it could be attained the condition of wives who are really abused by their husbands would be incalculably worse than it is at present. As it is, a woman is free to leave her husband and get a divorce, and a divorce on the ground of adultery is never denied. But many women are deterred from leaving their husbands by fear of loss of subsistence for themselves and their children. It would be interesting to learn how their condition would be improved by taking away five thousand dollars or five years of time from the bread-winner.

On the other hand, if the husband is frightened by the law, what of the great increase of marital rape and undesired motherhood? The former is no offense in the eyes of the law, and the prevention of the latter is a crime.

Sociologic Lesson. No XXVI.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

COMMUNISM. The various theories of communism are based upon a stage of human development in which protection from robbery is unnecessary, and in which a large proportion of the people are sufficiently altruistic to perform the labor requisite to produce the comforts of civilization without direct compensation. It is manifest that that stage has not yet been reached. The history of all socialistic communities demonstrates that it has not yet been possible to associate together a thousand selected persons developed up to that standard; for even in the most successful communities it has always been necessary to bring in a religious control of individual action, in order to reach harmony and prosperity. Wherever the individuals have been left free to be governed by their own impulses, the number of shirks and inefficients, squanderers, pilferers and quarrelers, has always been sufficient to prevent success. And even the best communities have always shared in the protection of the government, from outside invasion, theft and robbery. What is needed now is such a social system as will be self-sustaining under existing conditions. We will consider later how such a social system can be gradually developed into the displacement of hostile conditions, but first accept the fact of the necessity of protection of some sort, and seek for the highest protection with the least surrender of individual liberty.

Colonel Ingersoll, in his sermon at the dedicatory exercises of the Militant Church in Chicago, declared that the child of the future must be the child of love. The feelings of the mother become the character of the child and wedlock, other than wedlock of love, is a crime against the offspring. This same thought is taken up by Moses Harman, who has devoted years of study to the subject, and the result of his thought has been incorporated in a small brochure, entitled "Motherhood in Freedom." It certainly commends itself to both the liberal and the humanitarian, and there are none who would not be interested in its perusal. Much is said in certain quarters against our liberal divorce laws, but surely a thousand times more may be said against the suffering of defenseless and often friendless women who, in the name of the law, are treated worse than was any chattel slave. The work is strikingly radical and will at least stir up those whom it does not convince.—Chicago Vegetarian.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXIII.

With Imelda we will read Wilbur's letter:

"MY DARLING: The fact that I am writing this to you must of necessity be proof that Margaret has laid before me your letter containing the news that already the event has come into your life which I, in our parting hour, prophesied would come; though I still claim you as my darling, and though my heart still goes to meet you with the same tender emotions, I cannot do otherwise than say I am pleased. I am glad that that other has so soon stepped into your life, and, building upon the past, I take the responsibility on myself of giving the advice you ask of Margaret.

"The fact alone that you love this man, that your heart has so fully gone into his keeping, is to me the best evidence of his trustworthiness. Not but that you, as well as many another, are liable to make mistakes as to the character of any individual you may come in contact with, but in a case of spontaneous love I feel and know that the purity of mind itself, of which you are possessed, would intuitively recognize that which is not equally pure.

"That Norman should still be bound by old superstitions and creeds may prove an obstacle to the speedy consummation of your love. It is here your work begins; here your strength will be tested. If you would be a priestess in our holy work you will be expected to remain true to the sentiments you have so often expressed. Your soul must remain free and unfettered, even though the man may be purity and justice personified. Not a semblance even of the power the law gives to a husband must you put into his hands. If your love is great enough to trust him he will be generous enough to trust you, or he is not the man he has represented himself to be. If he is not generous enough to trust you, then your intuition will have been at fault—the blindness of a common love has been laid upon your vision.

"Where lies the beginning of your work?—you ask. I will tell you. Your first duty is one that you owe to him and to yourself. You say that in your past life lie hidden many dark spots. It is your duty in this case to lay bare these dark spots in the full light of day. It is thus you will test his strength of character. As he comes of a long line of Puritan ancestors this will be necessary. The old prejudices may be so deeply rooted that, rather than take to his arms one who, although not responsible for the actions of others, may by the ties of blood be allied to those that are, he may be willing to crush out a love that would leave his own heart mangled and bleeding. If such should be the case, my little girl, I understand full well that bitter pain must then for a while gnaw at the cords of your heart. But it will pass, and in passing leave you purer and stronger than ever.

"If, on the other hand, he stands the test I feel sure it will be only a short time until his whole soul will come to the understanding of the grand sublimity of full and untrammeled liberty. Love cannot be fettered. Love will always remain free; the greater his freedom the more certainty is ours of retaining him to make bright our lives. Try to fetter him, he unfolds his wings and mockingly takes his departure. Then, what are we to do with our empty lives?

"In justice to woman we must admit that she is at the greater disadvantage, no matter in what light the case may be placed. In marriage, it matters not how just may be the man whom she calls 'lord,' she is, she remains his property, according to the mandates of the law. No matter how willing he may be that she shall enjoy perfect freedom, society takes it upon itself to place a watch upon her. If her husband has no sense of honor, or of what is due to himself, the stern finger of the law points it out to him. Society prepares a code for her that she is bound to respect and accept as her guide. The path which he is asked to walk is not nearly so straight. There are many recesses and angles in it, if he chooses to explore them. If he does so quietly nothing will be said.

"On the other hand, we know only too well if woman refuses marriage, it is equivalent to throwing away all hope of ever enjoying life as nature has designed. If she dares to thus enjoy life she is ostracized from society.

"At the present time we are still in the dark. But may we not hope, sometime, to grow strong enough to defy the mandates of society? May not love find a way that shall yet defy all the lynx eyed agents of a corrupt moral code? May we not hope that man and woman both may yet be pure and natural as the new-born babe, when it is first placed in the mother's arms—at natures fount?

"Will you be strong, my Imelda? Think you, you can take your Norman by the hand and lead him on until he stands upon your own sublime heights? until he stands at your side? then side by side to explore the unknown heights that still lie beyond your field of vision?

"Be brave, my precious one; be strong, and when the time comes when we shall again meet, (and I feel that it will come,) and I fold you to my heart, pressing warm kisses on your lips, some prophetic spirit tells me that your Norman will stand by and understand.

"There must and will a time come when the full glory of a free love will be understood and enjoyed. So, look up to the goal in view; bravely work on, and remember there is strength in the knowledge of the unity of thought and purpose of those who work in a like cause, even though your friends with their supporting love are distant. Remaining as ever, loving you with a love that is absolutely pure, I am yours for truth of purpose, and for the best of humanity, WILBUR."

A long drawn sigh escaped the lips of Imelda as she laid the closely written sheets upon her knees. Well she knew that he was right. In the still hours of the night watches, by the side of the sick friend the thought had come to her again that open truth was the only course for her to pursue. But oh, how gigantic the task appeared. In all the three weeks the subject had never been touched again by them. Few indeed had been the moments she had been able to accord him, her strength being tested to its utmost, in her capacity as nurse. Being well aware of the state of things, Norman Carlton was far too noble to press for the reason of the loved girl's views, at such a time. For the present he accepted the boon of her love as a priceless jewel of whose possession he was assured.

But Imelda knew that the hour was coming when he would expect an answer to his question, and as Wilbur had stated, it was then her work would begin. If she dreaded that coming hour, was she to blame? Folding the letter she placed it back in the envelope and with the action there came to her, with overwhelming force, the realization of the grandeur of this man's character. What purity, what nobility! Even as the new love more fully filled out her life so did she understand better the true worth of the man who had first called her love into being.

"O, Margaret darling," was her mental comment, "when your heart chose Wilbur as its best beloved, it made a grand selection, no one will ever find his way into your life who will be able to look to you from a loftier height than that upon which he stands."

Recalling her wandering thoughts she next opened the epistle from Margaret, for such it proved to be. Such a long, warm, glowing letter; overflowing with the love her pure young heart contained. She had filled page after page, concluding with the words:

"And now my dearest girl, I think I have made my meaning clear. I have given you the best advice that I know of. I know, however, that it is the same as Wilbur's only perhaps in other words, and I feel that now we shall not be disappointed in our brave girl. Let me add one thing. I understand fully how difficult the making of such a revelation will prove; and yet it must be made. I can see nothing else you can do and remain true to yourself and lover. Not the shadow of a suspicion, of a deception, must lie between you. I will not say disgrace; that will exist, if it exist at all, only in your Norman's mind. But now for my advice:

"Write the history of your life. That will be easier. You can tell him all, everything, without the disadvantage of seeing in his face the emotions, that such a history might call into play. He will have time to think, and understand the full import of it all. You will not then receive an immediate answer, prompted by an impulse that might prove a barrier to your love. Cool, calm reflection is necessary in such a case, and as my own Imelda possesses her full share of common sense, she can but see the wisdom of such a course.

"Be brave, my dearest friend, my own loved one. If this man is worthy of your love he will stand the test. If he does not stand it, then I can but say he was not worthy. And now remember,—three hearts beat in love for you, and the united strength of that love is bent on the success of your heart's dearest hope (for of course my mother knows), and hoping to be re-united in a not too distant future, thus writes and advises your most sincere and loving friend, MARGARET."

This letter had been folded and placed side by side with that other one. Long had Imelda sat with bowed head and folded hands. Yes! both kind and loving friends were right. An inner voice told her that this was the only course to pursue. But the condition of the sick friend had not permitted her to think of it. Every minute of her time had been devoted to her. Her lover must wait until the dark, uncertain hours would be past; but now as Imelda sat and watched the peaceful sleeper, she realized that she could not spend the long hours of the night watch to better advantage than in the performance of this duty. The dreaded hour had passed; hope and sunshine were again seeking admittance at the portals of this home, and Norman was waiting, patiently waiting, for his answer. So when the morning broke, with its pale light, she folded the closely written sheets. With trembling hands and beating heart she wrote the address and sent them to their destination. Would he stand the test? When tried by this crucial ordeal, would he prove faithful and true?

I desire to call the attention of prospective mothers to the advertisement of "Niapon." I have investigated the claims made for it, and am satisfied, from the statements of those who have had experience,—the mothers and physicians—that it is a very great aid. So certain do I feel of this that I am sure that if I should ever again pass through that period, I would give "Niapon" a personal trial. This is not a "paid reading notice." The advertisement itself is paid for, but I am writing this because I am greatly interested in anything which will lessen the danger and pain of maternity. LILLIAN HARMAN.

VARIOUS VOICES.

John G. Cooper, Carbondale, Kansas:—I have saved the within for you. I intended to meet you all in Chicago at your last convention, but an important suit of mine here prevented. I shall always regret it, now more than ever since I have heard the sad news of S. P. Putnam's sudden death. It is sad, for we shall miss him in many ways very much.

D. L. Stockton, Lake City, Colo:—Inclosed you will find one dollar and fifty cents for which credit me one dollar on Lucifer and send Lucifer three months to —— ——, and also send me "Love Ventures of Tom, Dick and Harry." Lucifer is doing too much good for humanity for the friends of progress to allow it to be swamped in the sea of financial peril.

Nellie M. Mastick, Junction City, Wash.:—Find inclosed two dollars for renewal of subscription to Lucifer and "Our New Humanity." I have been very slow in send it but it is so hard to get money, as you know. This was my Christmas gift, so I send it where I know it will do the most good.

Do these figures correspond with the number printed on the wrapper of your Lucifer? If so your subscription expires with this number. Please renew for another year.

If you publish the story you may put me down for one copy. I'll manage to get it some way.

Nettie M. Payne, Massillon, Ohio:—I have been a reader of your thought-inspiring paper for some months and it has been a source of great enjoyment and benefit. So much indeed have I gained from its pages that I want more thought food along the same line. I see you have advertised an essay entitled "Motherhood in Freedom." Inclosed find price for same. I think I shall send for the year's publication of "Our New Humanity" in a short time.

J. W. G.:—I was much shocked to see in Chicago "Tribune" the account of Putnam and Miss Collins being found dead. I have seen no further account. It makes me very sad when I think of it. But they probably died without pain. And the dead are no more, but life in which is our life always continues, and it is of life we must think, never pursuing the dead in vain into oblivion.

Ruedebusch has made indeed a remarkable book, of great value to thoughtful and intelligent readers, but as I write him his "Propaganda" is not practicable.

P. P., Hagerstown, Ind.:—I have finally got money enough to pay up my arearage on Lucifer. I am sorry that you had to wait so long. My wheat crop was an entire failure; had to buy bread and seed, also interest on mortgaged note on my home, our farm products bring about one third of cost of raising, so we have but little to pay for reform papers and books. I must say that I am deeply interested in Lucifer's teachings, and would much like to take "Our New Humanity" but cannot for the present. Will send one dollar on Lucifer and sixty cents for books.

I have been talking to some friends in regard to subscribing for Lucifer, may get a name or two after the first of the year. It is a new doctrine to most people. There are but few whom evolution has developed to that degree, where they can throw off their old and cherished notions, and replace them with the ideal of equal liberty.

LOVE, MARRIAGE, AND DIVORCE

And the Sovereignty of the Individual.

A Discussion between Henry James, Horace Greely, and Stephen Pearl Andrews. There are here included the final replies of Mr. Andrews, refused by the New York Tribune, and a subsequent discussion, occurring twenty years later, between Mr. James and Mr. Andrews.

"The great lesson for the world to learn is that HUMAN BEINGS DO NOT NEED TO BE TAKEN CARE OF. What they do need is such conditions of justice and freedom and friendly co-operation that they can take care of themselves. Provided for by another, and subject to his will as the return tribute, they pine, and sicken, and die. This is true equally of women as of men: as true of wives as it is of vassals or serfs. Our whole existing marital system is the house of bondage and the slaughter-house of the female sex. Whether its evils are inherent or incidental, whether they belong to the essence or the administration of the institution, whether they are remediable without or only by means of revolution, are the questions that now have to be discussed."

Defeat and Victory.

TO D. M. BENNETT,—BY S. P. PUTNAM.

There can be no defeat in freedom's cause
Save for the moment. Though its flag may fall
Yet it will rise again, and sweep in light:
For all our hope is in its glowing folds—
The hope of ages, the undying hope
That beamed on Marathon and Salamis,
And ever yet hath grown more sweet and great.
Freedom, that rose sublime, with starry front,
With large life throbbing, from the mighty land
That burst upon Columbus' aching sight,
Like some fair paradise in golden sky—
Freedom so nurtured, child of storm and toil;
Child of the mountains and the boundless sea:
Child of man's heart and rich, exultant joy,
It cannot perish. Freedom cannot die.
Though it be seared with many a deadly wound,
Courage, brave friend; the prison walls bind not
The spirit in the breast; it shall go forth
And touch the living heart with living fire.
Thou shalt be consecrate to noble use,
Each weary hour shall be an angel bright
To sweep the music of advancing thought;
Thy labor shall be deep and grand and high,
Though done in felon's clothes. Each stroke shall be Resounding blows upon the mailed wrong
Heard through wide lands and better days to come.
The crown is with thee, and no prison bars
Can keep its luster from the nation's gaze.
Its fire shall leap from kindling soul to soul,
Till, like the thunder of the storm-vexed sea,
Shall roll the indignant voice, and thou art free;
The door shall open; chainless as the wind
Shall be thy body; dauntless as the truth
Shall be thy pen. Thou shalt still seek for truth
In the clear light of liberty; its beams
Thy living words again shall carry far.
The flag shall wave, the flag of freedom's cause,
Thy hand still bears in the darksome den,
Sink not. Faint not; for the sublimest past.
Heroes and martyrs, poets, prophets, seers,
Are with thee. We are with thee. All the light
Of heaven is with thee. Nature's vast heart,
The radiant bosom of the fruitful earth,
Thought's lustrous wealth—the music of the spheres—
All these are with thee. The great work moves on,
And thou art in it, spite of tyrants' chains,
And its reward shall make thee victor yet.

Popular Follies and Crimes.

BY JAMES S. DENSON.

A Christian writes that Lucifer's "chief work is to fight the marriage relation as authorized by God and Christian civilization." By "God," I presume that the writer means the Yahveh of the ancient Hebrews. As the only form of marriage that he knew anything about was polygamy, I fail to see the applicability of the Christian's remark. Regarding the marriage of "Christian civilization," that being indissolubly associated with the grossest and most destructive kind of non-legal prostitution, and being itself a system of slavery, it is greatly to the credit of this paper that it declines to enter into any compromise with it; that it is doing all that it can to make the most precious relations of men and women free, and ennobling because free.

"A Doctor's Wife," contributing to a medical publication, tells of a woman whose children came in such quick succession that she finally complained to her husband, when that gentleman consoled her with the information that "it is on account of women's sins that they suffer so." "A Doctor's Wife" pertinently inquires: "Tied to such men as these, shall women go on bearing children for them just for a support?" She reaches the conclusion that information regarding the prevention of conception could be safely given in such instances. I should say so! But the husband's gospel of submission is good Bible doctrine; what does "A Doctor's Wife" think of the use of that work as a text-book in schools, and of woman's superstitious reverence for its teachings?

It is unmanly to misrepresent the opinions of the dead. Convictions honestly cherished merit the respect and truth-telling of the world. While one lives, he may find it absolutely necessary to remain silent concerning some of his views; the so-called obligation of martyrdom rests rightly upon no man. Whether he will speak or not speak is a matter wholly within his own discretion. But when his lips are closed in death no one can justly asperse his memory and depreciate his intelligence by claiming that he was the victim of superstitions he had rejected. Still less is any person justified in misrepresenting the opinions of one who had never sought to wear a mental mask. An attempt is now being made to have it appear that the lamented May L. Collins was not the personal friend of the representative social radicals of the day. The truth is—and it reflects the greatest credit on both her intelligence and her courage—that she was their admirer and their loyal friend, seeking their companionship whenever possible, and openly expressing her own radical views. Her respect for the unshackled mother was unbounded, and her interest in the child of freedom was intense and loving. Don't lie about the dead.

Felix Adler lectured the other day on "The New Phase of Woman in Modern Society." He is reported to have said that if we observe that a change is taking place in the relations of the sexes, we should mark it well, and if "this change be in the right direction society will be benefited, and if not it will be detrimental to us." Will Mr. Adler kindly inform us how we can know a change is in "the right direction" unless it does benefit us? The gentleman has got the vehicle in front of the engine. We must reason from facts to principles, not from principles to facts. If the present movement in favor of larger liberty for woman is a benefit to her and through her to the race as a whole, it is really a movement in the right direction, even though it may cut its way through a half-hundred apriori assumptions concerning the relations of the sexes. Mr. Adler declares his sympathy with the "so-called woman's movement," but finds himself antipathetic as to certain forms that it has assumed, as no doubt we all find ourselves antipathetic to certain phases of the movement. The strangest part of Mr.

Adler's criticism is that wherein he says that the new woman who wants to be "mannish" is an agitator, implying that the new woman who does not want to be mannish is not an agitator. It seems to me that an agitator is one who wishes to impress his or her fellow-citizens with the truth of the ideas he or she accepts, and if that is so, then all who labor to propagate any opinion are agitators, including Professor Adler himself.

The clerical entertainers, notably such "stars" as Moody and Sankey, are trying to get up a great revival in New York and its environs. Moody has been at work here for some time, and he has now reached the incendiary stage of proceedings. On Sunday, January 10th, he preached an inflammatory discourse in the Academy of Music. He told his hearers to tear the nude paintings from the walls of their homes, and "burn the Sunday newspapers," he shrieked. "Why, I believe you are ready to do it," he continued; "I believe we are on the eve of a tidal wave of religion. The way to begin it is to get all the pictures that are lewd in one huge pile, tear rich paintings from your walls and from the art galleries, collect the newspapers in which are portraits of the nude, and make of all of them a huge bonfire in Fifth avenue. All honor to Anthony Comstock; I would to God we had a thousand Anthony Comstocks. If you haven't helped him, do it now. Send him a check to help carry on the work." There spoke the typical Puritan, the enemy of unexpurgated nature, the hater of art, of literature, of science the contemner of beauty, of human love, and of earthly joy; the admirer of ugliness, of gloom, of religious renunciation, of god-inspired fanaticism. This priestly incendiary would put the torch to the productions of human genius only because he now lacks the power to bind the genius himself to the stake and light the fagots at his feet. This would-be vandal stands ready to burn the representations of "the human form divine," "even if it burns New York," as he audaciously and shamelessly declares. In spirit Dwight L. Moody is worse than the incendiaries whom our judges are sending to Sing Sing for what are practically life terms. Such as he have ever been the menace of civilization, and its destroyers whenever they could grasp the sword of legal authority, or incite the mob, as Moody is now endeavoring to do, to lay the hands of bigoted ignorance upon the choicest fruits of man's heart and brain. If Mr. Moody should succeed in his crusade against art, and the flames of his bonfire in Fifth avenue should light our skies, it would not be the first time that Christian barbarians have so distinguished themselves. This modern revivalist is only a feeble imitator. The old Inquisitors knew well how to still the tongues of thinkers and palsy the hands of workers. He is even only an echo of the imbecile Salvation Army, which called attention to itself the other day by burning the "devil;" in the figure of Colonel Ingersoll, in effigy here in the streets of the metropolis. All these survivals of savagery burn pictures and books and the effigies of men merely because they cannot, just yet, burn the men themselves. For, as William Douglass O'Connor said when the asinine officials of Boston and the federal postmaster there were trying to suppress "Leaves of Grass," "Who knows, since fortune favors the brave and interprising, but that we may yet, step by step, succeed in bringing the fourteenth century into the nineteenth [or even the twentieth], and re-erect Montfaucon—that hideous edifice of scaffolds reared by Philippe le Bel, where the blackened corpse of Glanus swung beside the carcass of the regicide for having translated Plato, and where Peter Albin dangled gibbeted beside the robber for having published Virgil!" Curiously enough, Mr. Moody has not said a word about adding his Bible to the holocanst in Fifth avenue. Is it possible that in his crusade against the "indecent" he is going to permit himself to be frightened away by one of the chief offenders? Do not misunderstand me—the Bible is not "obscene," but it is just as "obscene" and not a tenth part as beautiful as the lovely pictures and statuary which this narrow-minded mountebank is inciting his poor dupes to destroy. All this outcry against art is really an outcry against the god in whom these religious people profess to believe. They say that he made man, and we know that clothes are simply a human invention, that children come into the world absolutely naked, that the other animals are naked, and all the flowers likewise. From the Theistic standpoint, god is the guilty party—the Vice Society exists only to frighten us into concealing his handiwork. A whitewashed hypocrite is infinitely more indecent than a nude woman or the photograph or painting of a nude woman.

St. George Mivart's "Duty" Doctrine Applied

BY E. C. WALKER.

Readers of Number 6 of "Our New Humanity" will find a review and criticism of an article written for the "Humanitarian" by the English Catholic and scientific writer, St. George Mivart, in which he maintains that it is the "duty" of wives to submit to their husbands, regardless of their own feelings, and to bear children to them. He declares that not to so submit is "degradation." The argument is ingenious, but weak and revolting. His critic asks him granting, for argument's sake, that it is the duty of the wife to accede to her husband's demands, if that is a duty that should be enforced by the law, and, if so, if that would not be the perpetration of rape by the express command of the state. In the November "Humanitarian," Grant Allen replied to Mr. Mivart, and in the December issue of that publication the reactionary propagandist rejoined. But it has remained for an American exponent of the law to authoritatively sanction the dictum of the English writer, as will be seen by the second paragraph following this. Judge Gunster has answered the questions I put to St. George Mivart.

Before giving the case adverted to in the foregoing, I will recount an incident detailed to me the other day by a most reputable gentleman who is a member of the society to which the application for relief was made. It appears that a man, who had long been in straightened circumstances and in poor health, applied to his benevolent organization for help. He was near death's door, and his wife was prostrate with a paralytic complaint, but was about to become a mother. She was marked for death before the coming child was conceived. Now, will St. George Mivart and Judge Gunster have the hardihood to contend that this wife did her duty simply in acceding to the demands of her diseased husband at a time when it was a grave question whether she herself would live to give birth to another child? Judge Gunster talks of "proper circumstances," but does he wish us to understand that he thinks there are ever circumstances in which the wife should surrender the sovereignty of her body into the keeping of her husband? As for St. George Mivart, he bases his plea for the wife's dutiful submission largely upon the necessity for race preservation. Does he think that a race preserved through marital rape is worth preserving? How strong a factor in race preservation would be a child born under the conditions here described?

The Scranton, Pennsylvania, "Republican," of December 2, 1896, in its report of court proceedings for the preceding day, gives us the facts that follow: Mary E. Hover sued her husband, H. J. Hover for cruel treatment. She swore that he took her on his lap, twisted her wrist, turned her fingers backward, and otherwise maltreated her, and did not desist until a servant had called in a neighbor. Earlier in the day (October 14th) he had abused her, and as a result she had suffered more or less pain for a week. "She charged that her husband for several years past had abused her and made her life miserable." Hover testified in his own behalf that the allegations made by his wife were false. He said that on the day mentioned he had been cross and his wife "grunty"; in the evening he went to her room to seek a reconciliation, and the violence of which she complained was the result of her aversion to the caress he offered; she scratched him and he held her hands, but not in anger and malice, as had been alleged. We are not concerned here with the question as to which of the parties to the suit has told the truth and which has committed perjury. It is the charge of the judge which interests us, and only so much of the testimony has been reproduced as was needed to make the narrative intelligible. Here is the "Republican's" synopsis of Judge Gunster's charge:

"Judge Gunster declared himself in the most positive terms while charging the jury. He said that if the jury believed that Hover in embracing his wife and holding her in his arms had been actuated by violence and malice, they could convict him, but he wanted to make himself plainly understood that it is the duty of a wife to be obedient to her husband, and he is entitled to a show of her affections under proper circumstances, and it is her duty to accept his advances. If the jury believed that Mr Hover used no more violence than was necessary to restrain her from refusing to do her wifely duty, then he was within his rights and could not be convicted."

Social radicals have often asserted that the wife is the only woman who can be outraged with impunity, and Judge Gunster, of Pennsylvania, now solemnly asseverates that they were right in their contention, for it is not to be presumed that he would charge a jury that any man could rightfully use as much violence as might be necessary to compel a woman other than his wife "to accept his advances." It may be added that the jury acquitted Mr. Hover.

Monotony versus Variety.

BY C. L. JAMES.

Mrs. Slenker's communication in last Light-Bearer, appears to me a powerful argument for variety. The seven little girls found it very tiresome that they all had to wear the same calico pattern. No wonder. Would it not have been worse if each had been condemned to wear the same pattern all her life instead of only till it wore out? And if one had been dressed for life in blue, one in white, one in yellow, etc.,—like Miss Lucy's babies in the song—and all for life, would that have mended matters? Oh Lord! how the blue would have longed for the yellow, and vice versa! A decided improvement would have been to change about blue for yellow, and both for white. And if, instead of taking these colors alternately, by an arbitrary rule, they had changed as they could agree—ah! that would have left little to be desired.

Of Emil Ruedebusch's great work "The Old and the New Ideal," I hope to say more by and by. Let this suffice now, that I feel my own work for sexual liberty closed by advent of the Legitimation League. Sexual freedom has become respectable—therefore I drop it. Apostleship of variety, nudity and plain English, devolves on Emil Ruedebusch.

Splitting Hairs.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

It is interesting to note that the society for the suppression of vice has made an advance of one half the breadth of a hair. Mr. Oram, who next to Anthony Comstock himself represents the society, said to the interviewer of the "Brooklyn Eagle:"

"No man is ever authorized by this society to lead any man into any kind of crime for the purpose of making a case against him. All our authorized agents are furnished with printed instructions telling them just what they can do and just what they cannot do. They are continually reminded by all the officers of the society that the society is for the suppression of vice, not for the creation of vice. For instance, an agent of this society might hear that a certain man was selling an improper book. If, when that agent called on that man and asked for a copy of the book, intending to purchase, and the man told him that he did not have the book in stock but would send for it, the agent would be forbidden to order the book, because that would be making himself accessory to the crime. Under no circumstances do we allow a representative of our society to compound with crime."

When A, the agent of the Comstock society, calls on B, the bookseller, for an "improper book," he is forbidden to order the book because that would make A accessory to the crime of obtaining the book from C. If it is a crime for B to obtain the book from C, it is equally a crime for A to obtain the book from B. In other words, A may commit a crime himself, but is forbidden to become accessory to the commission of the same crime by B. If to be accessory to the commission of a crime is "the creation of vice," is not committing the same crime the creation of vice? We have been claiming for years that the action of that society has been for the creation of vice. When "Nettie G. Harlan" wrote a decoy letter to procure means for committing abortion, he, Mr. Comstock, was accessory to the crime. When Mr. McAfee ordered from Mrs. Slenker the writings for the mailing of which he arrested her, he was accessory to whatever crime he supposed there was in the mailing. I am not surprised that a society with so much keenness of perception as to have discovered the difference this society now makes, has been keen enough to see or to imagine crimes nobody else can see. For my part, the distinction between inducing a bookseller to send for an improper book before he delivers it, and to send for it afterwards to replenish his stock, is so narrow that I can but admire the perspicacity which discovered it.

Salvation Not for the "Special Few," Only.

BY CYRUS W. COOLRIDGE.

Mr. Elbert Wakeman complains of having been misinterpreted by Lucifer correspondents. As far as it concerns me, I plead not guilty. I have not accused Mr. Wakeman of being a champion of Miss Charlotte Smith's methods. In his first communication Mr. Wakeman stated that Miss Smith's methods may be unwise, and believing as I do that they are positively bad, I took an opportunity to point out the evils which they may lead to. That was all. There was no intimation that Mr. Wakeman defended her methods.

As to scientific breeding, I have no quarrel with Mr. Wakeman. To me freedom does not mean the freedom to leave to the world a curse as an inheritance. Those women who wish to become mothers should do all they can to have good children; they should shun evil associations as much as possible. I am the last man in the world to advise the "diamonds of the race" to run the risk of being accosted by "mongrel curs." I am a defender of the bicycle, but I do not advise women to take rides on lonely roads where they are liable to be assaulted by ruffians; but really I do not think that many women are in need of such advice, for no woman, no matter whether she is a "diamond" or one of the "masses," wants to be raped, science or no science.

I cannot agree with Mr. Wakeman when he says: "Yes, let the masses of girls do as they like,—the risk is small." That one of the "special few" is of more value than are a score of "the masses" is true, but, after all, the world consists of masses. The special few cannot reform the world, so long as the masses of girls bring into existence undesirable children. If the world is to be saved, the masses, as well as the special few, must do their best to give us better babies.

Rev. E. P. Powell says: "The spiritual agnostic is an unchurched and irreligious man." Well, a man may be no worse for being "unchurched," and if an agnostic is "irreligious," then such men as Darwin, Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall and Lewis, such women as George Eliot and Harriet Martineau were irreligious; and if these fine and lofty characters were without religion, then the having of religion, as it is understood by Mr. Powell, is not necessary to insure intellectual and moral excellence, while it may co-exist, as we know, with low ideals and a still lower moral life. It is no discredit to a man to be without such a religion, or to be outside of a church which makes the profession of such a religion a qualification for membership. Rev. Mr. Powell seems to be much disturbed by the attitude of agnostics, but if he hopes to engage their serious attention, he should point out the real fallacies of their position and do less scolding on the subject. He possesses too much of the spirit of the orthodox pulpit, from which he preached several years, to have any intellectual hospitality for theories or ideas which he cannot make a part of his creed. He may, and will it is hoped, grow to a more liberal stature.

Birth, Death, and Funerals.

"If it were not for death and funerals I think the institution of the church would not stand longer. The necessity that men be decently buried, our fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, and children (notwithstanding the danger that they be buried alive) will long, if not forever, prevent our laying violent hands on it. If salaries were stopped off, and men walked out bodily at last, the minister and his vocation were gone."—Thoreau's "Autumn."

There is certainly much truth in this tersely worded statement. The mystery that enshrouds the change called death, the longing to know where our loved ones have gone, and if still alive, whether happy or unhappy, this mystery and these longings clothe with awful importance the man who is believed to know more about death than do his fellow-mortals, and who can speak words of comfort to surviving friends.

Yes, there is much of truth in these terse lines of Thoreau, but the terse statement needs to be supplemented by another. If he had said,

"If it were not for its control over births the institution of the church would not stand longer," his saying would have been quite as truthful, if not more so. It is through its control of sex, its control of the mating of human beings for parentage, that the church perpetuates its power, more than in any other way.

It is through sex—and especially through the sex-nature of woman, whose body holds the young life in its keeping during the first nine months after conception, that human beings are generated or born into the earth-life. The church assumes control of the sex-hood of woman; the church derives a revenue from the license it gives to woman to associate with man in the sex-relation; or, which is practically the same thing, it derives revenue, power and influence as a teacher of sex-morality, by granting to man the privilege of sex-association with woman.

True, the judge or civil magistrate now divides with the priest the business of controlling sex, by this means establishing a moral code as to what births are right and lawful and what are not, but it should be observed that in doing this, as well as in administering religious oaths, the judge assumes the role of priest, and thus aids the church in controlling the masses. "Whom God hath joined, let no man put asunder," is usually a part of the marriage ceremony when performed by a civil officer, and when he administers, or causes to be administered, the oath, or civil affirmation with uplifted hand, he teaches the church doctrine of rewards and punishments in a "life after-death."

The church teaches the subordination of woman to man, the enslavement of woman to man, in the sex-relation, in her work of creating new human beings—"Man is the head of woman as Christ is the head of the Church," and "wives submit yourselves to your husbands as unto the Lord," etc. The natural result of this teaching is a race of human beings submissive to the priest, that is, submissive to the church, and also to the judge, who holds and exercises priestly powers. Enslaved motherhood by natural sequence, means enslaved offspring, and hence "the institution of the church" becomes self-perpetuating.

From infancy upward woman is taught to revere the priest as a Divine oracle, and when he tells her that independent motherhood—motherhood not sanctioned by himself—is unlawful and sinful, woman accepts the decision as the voice of God. And if, obeying her natural instincts and strongest impulses she should become a mother outside the pale of priest-made marriage, so powerful is the influence of early teaching that, in many cases at least, the child is no better than if born in slavery—legal wedlock,—because the mother cannot rise above the standard of morality set for her by her theologic teachers, and thus she incarnates in her offspring, by prenatal impression, a feeling of shame, of self-depreciation and self-abasement, and hence the child easily becomes a servant, a slave, to the church-state officials under whose rule he was born.

Yes, control over the creatory—marriage and birth—and over childhood and burial of the masses of people, gives power to the priest that will long prevent freedom-lovers from "laying violent hands on the institution of the church."

Hence the importance of rousing woman to a sense of the degradation to herself and children that inheres in the canon law,—or church law of marriage, and to a sense of the necessity of throwing off the priestly yoke if she would live a true life—a normal and happy life, and especially if she would become the mother of free, self-respecting, self-reliant children.

At the Forest City.

Since my first letter from Cleveland was written the short winter days have chased each other with startling rapidity, and now the middle of January is here, reminding us that soon the balmy airs of spring will take the place of the chill blasts of winter. Most of the time, however, since New Year's day, the weather here has been unreasonably warm; a little snow, but so little that it seems hard to believe that only a few hundred miles westward the blizzards have raged, during the first half of January with phenomenal violence.

While it was my intention to take a little mid-winter relaxation the time has not been spent in idleness. My forenoons in Cleveland have been devoted to writing—correspondence, etc., and the afternoons and evenings to introducing Lucifer and "Our New Humanity" to the attention of the "Buckeyes," as the Ohioans are called,—to holding parlor meetings at which discussion in Race improvement through the emancipation of Motherhood, has been the leading feature.

The most important event of my sojourn thus far was the meeting at the Franklin Club, on Champlain street, Sunday the tenth inst. The attendance was unusually large, and notwithstanding the length of the session—nearly four hours—the interest manifested was unabated; very few going out till the janitor threatened to turn off the light. I was given about an hour for the opening—subject "Liberty, Love, Wisdom, mankind's true and only saviors." Among those who followed with remarks of approval or dissent, were, Mrs. H. R. Adams, author and lecturer—representing what is called the "Higher Criticism," in Presbyterian Theology; Miss Edith Slade, teacher in city schools; Mr. Taylor, of the "Silver Knight," Cleveland; Mrs. Mary Smith, of Newburg, O.; Anna Perkin, prominent as a reformer in Woman's Dress, Cleveland; Mrs. Bedford, Joseph Lee, Claude Taylor, Fred Schulder, Dr. Copper, H. H. Cline and others of the Franklin Club.

Several "reporters" were present. The "News and Herald" of Monday morning, under the caption "A Windy City Anarchist Speaks," said:

A Chicago Anarchist, by name Moses Harman, "entertained" the members of the Franklin Club yesterday afternoon with a long and exhaustive paper on "Liberty, Love and Wisdom," which he said was a trinity which "guided the human race from the lowlands of ignorance to the uplands of knowledge and freedom." The central thought throughout the address was that the human race would be much happier if there were no man-made laws. The address was freely discussed by the members present.

The "Plaindealer" said, "A speaker from Chicago has invented a science which he wants adopted," adding:

A large attendance at the Franklin club was called out yesterday afternoon to hear the lecture of Moses Harman of Chicago, editor of Lucifer, on "Liberty, Love and Wisdom," which he characterized as a trinity, in his own mind, superior to that of "Father, Son and Holy Ghost." Mr. Harman is one of those few and peculiar persons who advocate what he chooses to term the "sexologic science."

The burden of his lecture was his opposition to the legalized form of the marriage contract. "Marrying," he said, "is a religious contrivance that has never taken well with humanity, and how to evade its restrictions, while appearing to conform thereto, has become one of the fine arts. Nature rebels against the creedal chains, and the monogamy dogma will continue to make men and women hypocrites until they get sense and courage enough to live honest, open lives, neither ashamed of love nor fearing it, no matter unto whom it may draw them."

The language here attributed to me is as near to the truth as reporters commonly get it, and presumably I should be thankful that it is no worse. The most gratifying feature of it all was the very general recognition by the audience, as voiced by the various speakers of the paramount importance of the emancipation of motherhood, as the first step in real reform—in true human progress.

By request I gave, at the close, a brief extemporaneous talk in regard to the late and much lamented demise of Samuel P. Putnam and May L. Collins, which was listened to with marked attention. At a previous meeting a committee on resolutions, and suggesting the propriety of holding a "Memorial" meeting in Cleveland, to do honor to the memory of the dead leaders, was appointed by the club, the chairmanship of which committee was kindly tendered to the writer of these lines. The committee met at the house of Mr. L. B. Silver, a well known and influential "Secularist," and one who had arranged, or was arranging, a lecture engagement in Cleveland, for May L. Collins to come off about this time. Resolutions were drafted and preliminary steps taken to hold the memorial meeting in the near future.

Mr. Tucker's Short and Easy Method.

BY E. C. WALKER.

Mr. Benjamin R. Tucker is one of the brainiest men of this generation, and he is a most genial, companionable fellow, despite the opinion to the contrary formed of him by those who have never met him. But there are some occupations for which he is not naturally qualified. One of these is bookkeeping. In estimating the assets and liabilities of men, he cannot strike a correct balance. In approximately accurate moral bookkeeping the accountant adds up the columns of debits and credits, subtracts the small total from the larger, and sets down the balance in its proper place. Mr. Tucker proceeds by a different method; he runs his eye down the debit column until it rests on an item that looks rather large; then he puts on the magnifying glasses of Disfavor and gazes long and intently at the item; the longer he studies it the more mountainous it appears; the glasses show every unfavorable detail in exaggerated ugliness, without taking into account a single palliative line of heredity, education, or environment. "Enough," he cries in disgust, as he draws his cancelling pen heavily through the column of credit items, "he was BAD, and must be damned and forgotten." The books are closed for good and aye. Now, it scarcely needs to be said, this will not do; the process is altogether too brief and summary for justice. Mr. Tucker's is "a short and easy method in bookkeeping," but it is a short-cut that does not give time for judicial estimation of the mingled bad and good in men and women. Man is complex, not simple, in his moral no less than in his physical and intellectual make-up, and it is not fair to damn him nor to unqualifiedly commend him for a single quality or act.

Mr. Tucker sends Samuel P. Putnam into the limbo of oblivion, but the gallant and generous Freethought President will not stay there; rather, he will not reach the destination assigned him; there are too many stanch friends of liberty, men and women, who knew and loved the man Putnam to permit him to be forgotten in this generation at least. No one is stupid enough to assert that he, any more than any other man, was without flaw, but when his character is fairly balanced it is seen that he was a good man, as men go in this world where none is perfect, a hard worker for what he deemed the right, and a man whose word was a bond. It is unfortunate for Mr. Tucker that of the three men in the ranks of Progress who, up to this time, have assailed Samuel Putnam, he is the only one who could have been expected to do better. Two editors, ex-ministers, have been true to their early training in the school of supernatural moralism, and their animadversions are not in the least surprising. As Mr. Tucker has as strong a feeling of contempt as I have for the moral prosing of Moore and Shaw he should agree with me that he is very unfortunate in being bracketed with them as counsel for the prosecution in the cause of "History vs. Samuel Porter Putnam."

Rev. Mr. Hillis, Dr. Swing's successor in Chicago, says: "Epicurus beheld life as a tragedy. Soon death would destroy all. Since tomorrow man must die let him feast and riot today." This is a sample of Mr. Hillis' misrepresentations. Epicurus lived a life of simplicity, frugality and moderation. He was not simply temperate, but abstemious. And he exhorted men to a rational life, pointing out the evil effects of excessive indulgences. Only by slander has his name become proverbialized for feasting and rioting. Mr. Hillis ought to know this, but perhaps he does not; for he seems to lack accurate knowledge on a great many subjects which he introduces in his sermons. And although he is supposed to be rather liberal, he is dominated by the theological spirit and loses no opportunity to cast reflections upon eminent Freethinkers. A few Sundays ago, John Stuart Mill's life and social relations were made a subject of unjust and impertinent criticism by the reverend gentleman. Would it not be better for him to denounce some of the business methods, and notoriously corrupt practices which are now common among people who make up such rich and fashionable congregations as the one to whose mental appetite Mr. Hillis caters? Or would he thereby offend many of those upon whom he depends for his large salary?

Sociologic Lesson. No XXVII.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

SURRENDER OF INDIVIDUAL LIBERTY. In the reaction against infringement of individual liberty, there has arisen a revulsion against all surrender of individual liberty, reaching its culmination in the theory of Josiah Warren, and in the theory of anarchy. The Josiah Warren of today would not infringe upon the liberty of the Josiah Warren of tomorrow by making any promise whatever. If a tailor made him a coat, he incurred the risk that the Josiah Warren of tomorrow would conclude to demonstrate his absolute liberty by refusing to take it. All co-operation involves a voluntary surrender of individual liberty in certain respects. In communism the surrender of individual liberty is very great; for each one is bound to perform his share of the necessary work, and there are no means of knowing what his share is. Any one sensitive to the good opinion of his fellows must perform much more than his share, especially if his work involves much skill and mental exertion, in order to satisfy the ignorant and unskillful that he is doing as much as they. So with regard to individual ownership: every communist surrenders the liberty of appropriating to his own use that which his own hands have created, in order to satisfy the envious who wish to share what they do not appreciate. The highest individual liberty can only come from freedom from censorship of others as to work done or property used, necessitating the recognition of individual property; and it can only come from such co-operation as will secure cheap production; necessitating such surrender of individual liberty as may be essential to secure co-operation, the extent of such surrender continually diminishing as the co-operation becomes more perfect and as products become cheapened.

Letter From an Old Contributor.

Another year has gone and still ignorance and bigotry hold the race in chains. The struggle is a hard one, and I do not wonder that now and then a worker, refusing to go further, lies down to rise no more. But I did not sit down to write in this sad strain, but to wish all the readers of Lucifer a "Happy New Year," and to give them the whereabouts of an old contributor.

I left Antioch the 2nd, and, going to San Francisco, found I had a little spare time so went up to 621 O'Farrell street and had the pleasure of dining with your friend and patron, Cora A. Morse, M. D.

Mrs. Morse is a very busy woman. She has not only a good practice, but has fitted up the basement of her home and called together a group of working girls, thirty in number, who meet at stated intervals to have the benefit of her teaching. Last summer she took a respite from toil and paid a visit to the Yosemite, reveled in the beauty of its scenery, climbed its mountains, and wrote descriptive letters home which are so life-like that one almost sees and feels it all. At the request of friends she has had them published and finely illustrated. I was honored with a copy, and was so delighted with it I mailed it to Topeka, that friends there might read and return. I wanted to share the pleasure with them. By the way, if any of your readers should wish a copy they can get one by sending fifty cents to her at the above named street and number in San Francisco.

At 2.15 P. M. I crossed the ferry and took the train for this place, fifty-five miles from the city in the beautiful Santa Clara valley, lying between the Santa Cruz mountains and Coast Range, and about twenty miles from the Pacific coast, where I am now staying with another of your patrons, my old time friend, Mrs. Dr. Dobson-Barker, formerly of Maquoketa, Iowa. The scenery and climate is beautiful, and I hope to gather some of the strength and life-force that I need so much, if I continue to work, and if I cannot, I do not wish to tarry in this life, for it is not a pleasant task when old and crippled, to struggle for bread and shelter, merely to prolong an earthly existence. If any of your readers will send to me one dollar for my last work, "My Century Plant," or for "Perfect Motherhood," they will materially assist me in my struggle, as well as aid in scattering liberalizing thought; and now, that you may live many years to carry on your work is the wish of LOIS WAISBROOKER.
Los Gatos, Calif., Jan. 7, 1897.

Our false modern society has written in its code infamous and cruel punishments to defend the modesty and innocence of women, and it has sown in all paths of life so much immunity to defend its vices, as to render every infamy lawful to man, to disarm woman of all weapons.

To pretend that a "prudent" marriage generates love, is the same as to sow pumpkins and wish them to produce melons. —Mantegazza.

Protection, not Punishment.

S. H. Preston, in "Hall's Journal of Health."

There were probably beings born with as special tendency to sin as others are to scrofula. There is a virus of vice in their moral make-up for which they are no more accountable than for bad blood in their bodies. They are what may be truly termed fœtal felons—children conceived in criminal impulse, or maybe imbibing the malice of murder in their mother's milk. Poor guiltless victims of parental ignorance or gestational conditions! Their only crime is in being born, in coming into the world as criminals through the cruelty of circumstances; yet it is a crime the world will not condone, and fearful are the punishments it frequently inflicts.

Oh, yes, of course, society should protect itself, but not as the hunter with hounds in pursuit of the rabbit or the hare. The world is wide enough and mankind mighty enough to quarantine every earthly evil—to put every criminal in probationary isolation, to exhaust every resource of experimental reformation, before having recourse to cruel and retaliatory punishment. It has not been conclusively shown that even the worst felon that ever lived was wholly beyond the pale of human reclamation.

All that society has a right to ask is safety, not judicial vengeance.

He who robs you wrongs himself worse than you. You may recover your property or purchase more, but he has corrupted his conscience, ruined his reputation, assassinated his manhood. He has inflicted upon himself a misfortune, while you have but sustained a pecuniary, and perchance, a trifling loss.

The treatment of crime is truly a solemn subject. Its commission is most frequently the effect of ignorance, folly, unpremeditated parley with temptation, or unfortunate relations of life.

The old vindictive method of dealing with crime has had a thorough trial and crime is still increasing at an appalling rate. Now, let society seek a system of prevention and reformation rather than one of punishment and condemnation—employ its magnificent moral machinery in providing for the propagation of better beings, stop the supply of criminals from the cradle and permit the sunshine of a beneficent civilization to pervade our prisons and penitentiaries.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXIV.

The sultry summer day was at its close, and Norman Carlton had just finished reading the letter that Imelda had written the night before. A troubled look was upon the frank and honest face, as he stood at the open window looking out at the falling shadows, but seeing nothing. In one hand he still held the fateful sheets; the other hand he held to his aching temples. He stood and gazed until dusky twilight faded into starlit night. Ever and anon a deep sigh escaped the drawn lips as he thought, and thought, and thought.

But what was it he thought? Did that miserable tale of woe show him only the impracticability of an alliance with a child of the people? A woman whose mother had no right, according to the views of society, to the title of "lady;" whose sister had made an outcast of herself; whose brother might, even now, be occupying the cell of a criminal; whose past life had been one long privation and struggle with fate. His own lady mother and sister! Was it not his duty to first consult their views, their feeling upon the matter?

Or was it that he was made of more noble material? Were his views so broad that it was of no consequence what the world might say? It could hardly be expected, when we consider the training of his past life, that he would now have no battle to fight. It was not pleasant to know that the woman who had won his love should be so unpleasantly connected, but while this knowledge was to him most depressing, it also had the effect of raising, many fold, the respect he felt for her. What could have been easier for her than to keep these matters secret? It gave him a better insight into the nobility of her character. She at least was truth itself. She would prove trustworthy. She was above reproach. He was doing battle with the old prejudices based on society codes, as they rose, one by one, to assail his love.

But to do him justice his love wavered not for one instant. If the setting be tarnished will that fact diminish the lustre of the diamond? He knew that his jewel was of the purest; why should the setting trouble him? But all was not yet plain to him. He remembered that night under the maples when she had refused him marriage—not love. Love she had given then as freely as now. He saw it then, he knew it now. But now again she makes the same refusal. "You understand now," she wrote, "why it is that I cannot marry you."

His noble manhood was all alert now. Does she think so meanly, so basely of him as to suppose that he would add to the burden that had so many years been resting upon those slender shoulders, by withdrawing his proposal? If that is what she thinks, her opinion of him is not so exalted as he could wish and—he must seek her—must see her tonight. With him to think was to act, and a few minutes later finds him on the way to the woman of his choice. It was with a dazed feeling that he stood upon the marble steps awaiting an answer to his ring. What would be the outcome of this night's quest?

His card again found her at the bedside of the patient preparing for another long night watch by herself. Her heart beat high when the little bit of pasteboard was placed in her hand. Mrs. Boswell had not yet retired. She saw the flush steal over the fair brow and an understanding came intuitively to her as to what it meant. It was not so many years ago that she too had received a lover's visit, and she knew so well that since the illness of Mrs. Westcot the young girl had had no time to spend on friends or lovers. So she kindly said:

"Go and see your friend. I am not tired tonight and can well remain several hours longer." With an appreciative "Thank you" Imelda accepted the kind offer and descended to the drawing room, where but one jet of gas was burning and which but dimly lit the room.

Scarcely had she entered when she felt herself folded with strong arms to a wildly beating heart. Lips that whispered, "My own love," were pressed firmly to hers. Her heart was full, her bosom heaving. That he held her thus was ample proof that to him she was just as lovable now as before he knew her wretched story. Brushing the soft dusky waves of hair from the flushed temples, he asked:

"Will my girl have a little while to spare for me tonight? I would have you walk with me under the maples. Will you come?" Without a word she turned to the hallway and taking a soft white scarf from a rack, threw it over her shoulders and said:

"Now, I am ready." Together they wended their way to the silver leaved trees where once more they paced back and forth, his arm about the graceful form, his head bent until it rested against hers. Every attitude betokened the love they bore each other. O, how he talked, how he plead. But the slender girl at his side was strong and firm. She understood the ground she was treading upon. She met him at every turn.

He loved her, and as he listened to her arguments, as he watched the sparkle of her eye, as he got a better insight into her life, he felt that here was indeed a woman of superior qualities, a woman possessed of rare intellect. And as she met him, point after point, he began to see things in a different light. Dim and hazy at first yet still he saw a difference. Not that he showed an inclination to acknowledge the truth of any of the pictures she painted. O, no! not quite so easy are deep-rooted superstitions and prejudices uprooted. Yet she gave him food for thought.

She pointed out to him conditions as they exist throughout the country. She showed him how one vexed question is entangled with another. She drew his attention to the masses of workers who with their dollar a day,—sometimes a little more, sometimes even less,—have no time for self-improvement, no time for healthful recreation. That recreation which is of an elevating character, is quite unattainable and that which is within their reach is of the most demoralizing kind. The swilling of vile drinks, with vile companions in dens still more vile.

She spoke of the overburdened wife and mother, wearing away her life in drudgery and loneliness. At the close of his day's toil the husband brings no love to the cheerless home. That which he had named, and believed love on their wedding day has long since fled; yet of this union spring unwished-for children; children gestated in an atmosphere of hate; idiots and criminals ushered into being to fill our prisons and insane asylums. The employer class, on the other hand, least upon the wealth these unfortunates produce, and by their excesses sow the seeds of crime in their offspring.

"On all sides," said Imelda, "through the force of circumstances young lives are lost in the sloughs of vice and shame. Woman sells her virtue to the highest bidder; the one for a passing hour, the other for a life time. Which of the two is the worse? The merciless and unnatural codes of society demand the unsexing of woman by strangling nature's desires, then these codes permit one man to drive her to the grave or to the mad house through the power given to him by the law. The woman that would be true to her normal instincts, the woman that would practicalize her natural right of being a mother, must first sell herself for all time to some man, who, in return, forces upon her what at first was a pleasure and blessing but now a hundred-fold curse. To surrender herself in love with holiest emotion is a sin, is a demoralization. To endure the hated embrace of the man who long since murdered every trace of that holy love, is a duty and virtue.

"To escape such thralldom is to her an utter impossibility, as the only way out lies through that most damnable of abominations, the divorce court, where every pure instinct of a sensitive woman's nature is outraged to such extent that generally she prefers, of the two evils, the marital outrage to the expose.

"And yet the world goes on. Ignorant mothers bear and rear ignorant children. From their birth nature is strangled. They are fed and clothed in an unhealthful, unnatural manner, so that the wonder is, not that there are so many small grave but rather that so many survive. The little girl with propensities to romp is told she is a hoyden, a tom boy. The boy with refined sentiments, that he is a 'Sissy,' and so on throughout the long category. We are bound, fettered, on all sides from the cradle to the grave. No matter what misery, what woe, springs therefrom never go your own way, but only that which is mapped out for you through custom which has been foisted upon society. O, it is all so unnatural, so miserable, this binding, this fettering, this laying down laws that are only made to be broken."

She had spoken rapidly, and had warmed in her enthusiasm. Her head thrown slightly backward with a motion most graceful, her eyes shining with a glory that was beautiful, and Norman did not fail to be struck by it.

"How can it all affect us, my sweet?" he asked. "Are we not far above all the horrible pictures you have drawn?"

"I hope so," she answered. "I do, indeed, hope we are above it, but don't you see every picture has its ground work in the 'Thou shalt,' and 'Thou shalt not,' of some law? Every picture has its clanking chains and the heaviest is always the marriage chain. Don't you see, don't you understand?" He folded her close in his arms, an action which she by no means resented.

"And must our sweet love be sacrificed because of those horrible conditions? Have you not more faith in the voice of your heart?" Tears sprang to her eyes. O, how hard it was to steel that heart to the pleadings of the precious voice. How could she make him understand that he possessed the unbounded trust, the most unconditional love of her whole being?

"I have all the faith in the world in you," she said, as with trembling fingers she caressed the fair locks that fell in clustering masses over the open noble brow.

"Can you not see, can you not understand that I love you with all the strength of my being? Let us be happy now, in the present, in that love, and trust to the future to lift the veil, to dispel the clouds,"—and he could not dissuade her. He kissed the tears from the shining dark eyes. His love for her grew with every hour. He realized that bitter suffering in the past had sown the seed of the present strength of character and growth of views to which until now he had given but a passing thought.

Freedom of Conscience.

Oh, brave Apostle, thou hast truly said
It is a trivial thing indeed to be Judged of man's judgment! Conscience must be free,
Nor blindly nor dogmatically led,
Either by living oracles or dead:
For truth admits of no monopoly,
And where it points each for himself must see
Nor fear an independent path to tread.
Honor to him who speaks his honest thought,
Who guards his reason as a sacred trust,
Demands the truth for every dogma taught,
And turns dissenter only when he must!
For he shall rise by whom the light is sought,
To the high plane where stand the wise and just.

Popular Follies and Crimes.

BY JAMES S. DENSON.

As a friend said the other evening, nothing is more impressive than an inconvenient fact. It is a fact that sexual attraction ever seeks and sooner or later finds an equilibrium. Behold, then, the folly of enacting that a man and woman shall be "true" to each other the whole period of their lives! You might as well decree that water shall run up hill.

Now, as we are told by the newspapers, it is in Kansas that the bloomer and the bicycle are to be legislated out of existence. At all events, so far as women are concerned; men, I suppose, will be permitted to continue to wear bifurcated garments and ride wheels. But women, the helpless creatures, are to be saved from destruction by the massive brain of Representative Lambert, who purposes to introduce a bill forbidding the wearing of bloomers and making it a misdemeanor for a woman to appear in a public place astride a bicycle. We might laugh at these freaks did we not know that they so very often constitute a large majority in legislative bodies.

The papers say that at Anderson, Indiana, the barbers are agitating for a law to tax whiskers. This is of a piece with the clamor of certain doctors against the dissemination of information relating to the prevention of conception. The barbers and the doctors alike want more jobs. As the functions of the doctor and the barber were once combined in the same person, it is perhaps not strange that the barbers and doctors of the present age should be animated by the same spirit of monopoly. Joined with these gentlemen of the razor and lancet are the preachers, who want Sabbath laws so that there will be no competition with the pulpit in the pleasant task of furnishing Sunday amusement. And there are others.

In Boston recently seven persons were killed in twenty-four hours by inhaling illuminating gas. Forty were thus killed between February 5, 1896, and January 4, 1897. The number of deaths due to this cause is constantly on the increase, not only in Boston but in other parts of the country. Carbonic oxide is the poisonous principle in illuminating gas. Coal gas—gas made from coal—contains from 5 to 7 per cent. of this poison; water gas—gas made by the decomposition of water and combined with the vapor of naphtha—contains from 29 to 32 per cent. of carbonic oxide. Water gas is in use in Boston, and is almost odorless. Taking these facts into consideration, it is easy to understand how people exposed to the deadly fumes of this gas so quickly succumb. That persons may be suffocated while a jet is burning in the same room was shown in a recent New York accident, where the secretary of Typographical Union No. 6 and another compositor were found dead in the morning in a room where the gas from another valve was burning. It is not necessary to invent theories of murder or suicide to account for the death of men and women who had not the slightest motive for either murder or suicide, as has been gratuitously done by malevolent and foolish people in a late instance.

A poor demented fellow writing for a nameless sheet says that the "Investigator" and "Truth Seeker" and other Liberal papers "deserve the severest censure for advocating the liquor traffic." This is said because those papers are opposed to prohibition. He might just as pertinently have declared that the "Investigator" and "The Truth Seeker" and Freethinkers generally "deserve the severest censure for advocating" Catholicism. There was no more reason for making the one inane remark than there would be for making the other. Freethought papers "advocate" Catholicism when they protest against the proscription of Catholics no more than they "advocate" the liquor traffic when they antagonize prohibition, and vice versa. It seems to be a hopeless task to make stupid proscriptionists see that the one fundamental principle of Freethought is the right to disagree. The veriest bigot will zealously defend the right of another to agree with him. The real test of his asserted Freethought is his willingness or unwillingness to defend the right of dissent. How he acts when put to this test shows whether he is in fact a Freethinker or an authoritarian.

The police force of New York is now addressing itself to the subjects of dress and art. To be sure, it has been doing so to some extent for many years, especially since Roosevelt became the head of the Police Commission, but for the last two months it has devoted itself seriously and unanimously to the task of regulating the private affairs of individuals in matters of clothing and adornment. That this is so, one is convinced on reading the newspaper articles dealing with the daily doings of the "guardians of the peace." One sees much about the raiding of dinner parties, the inspection of plays in the theaters, the supervision of the conduct of women in the streets, the regulation of poster advertising, and the like, but comparatively little concerning the protection of peaceable citizens against the encroachments of the invasive private members of the community. The normal work of a police force is not regarded as of first importance by the men who are in power in New York City. The burglar is not in so great danger of seeing the inside of a jail as is the boy caught pitching pennies or the colored man playing craps in some obscure corner. A woman must speak to no man (except a policeman) on the streets at night after ten o'clock, not even to inquire her way, on penalty of being dragged off to the station-house as a common character. And this condition of affairs is daily growing worse.

Agent George Oram of the Vice Society arrested in New York, on January 23d, two street sellers for offering to the public a book called "Art Studies," containing pictures of nude women. This again brings up the subject of human nakedness. If "God" thinks nudity is wicked why did not "he" provide that every baby girl and boy coming into the world should be clothed in the garments adapted to the sex of the child? By those who worship "Nature" as a personality, the same query, modified to adapt it in form to their pet superstition, may be profitably pondered. This senseless crusade against the pictured nude results, of course, in the degradation of art and the lowering of the moral nature. With free competition in displaying men and women as they are instead of as their tailors and dressmakers caricature them, we should do away with ninety-nine one-hundredths of the poorest of the pictures of the nude and the partial nude that are now eagerly seized by men and children, yes, and by women, too. Any stuff will go that can be smuggled past the sentries of the censorship. Freedom in art is essential to the improvement of art. The same is true in the matter of contraceptics. Here these goods are under the ban of the law; in England, the sale is practically open. The result is what was to be expected; the American product is vastly inferior to the English. Where people are forced by the law to buy the first thing they can sneak into their possession, or go without, they will be imposed upon by those who engage to supply their wants. They have no opportunity to examine, to accept or reject, in a free market. We are law-mad.

In New York, Mary L. Musgrave brought suit for separation from her husband, Andrew J. Musgrave, alleging that he had knocked her down and so injured her that she was confined to her bed for several weeks. The other day Judge Beekman, of the Supreme Court, handed down his decision in the cause. He says that even if the charge be true it is not sufficient to justify the court in granting a separation. The reader will remember that the law of New York grants the privilege of divorce only for adultery, and that the utmost redress that Mrs. Musgrave could get under the law would be the opportunity to live apart from her husband, to whom she would have to remain "true" and who could secure a divorce from her if she should be "untrue." She asks for the half loaf of liberty without love and is told by Judge Beekman that she cannot have it, that being knocked down and disabled for weeks is not a wrong sufficient to justify him in giving her once more the power to control her own person to the extent that a legal separation would confer that power upon her. She had not asked—the law of the state would not let her ask—for the full rights of the citizen; she knew that if she got the decree of separation she must remain alone in the world while her husband lived. All that she could beg for was freedom from the curses, the blows, and the caresses of the one man who is protected by the law in showering either and all upon her as the whim takes him. And this partial freedom is denied by a man who has, rightfully, no more jurisdiction in the premises than a Digger chief. Yet some women—nearly all women—say they have all the rights they want!

The Medical Priesthood and Woman's "Duty."

BY E. C. WALKER.

St. George Mivart evidently knew what he was writing about when he asserted that it was woman's moral duty to bear children, no matter how averse she might be to the performance of that task. At all events, he has the new priesthood, that of medicine, at his back, if we may judge the attitude of the drugging fraternity from the utterances of some of its representatives. In a recent issue of the "Medical World" there is a discussion of the question of the prevention of conception. It seems that the question had been broached in previous issues of the same publication, but none of the writers had ventured to describe any preventatives. Now, however, three doctors tell something of their experience, each offering his favorite method for the consideration of his professional brethren. All these physicians affirm that there are circumstances under which it is justifiable to prevent conception. The first, Dr. H. P. Monroe, narrates his experience with patients who, before he had prescribed for them in this particular, had "been bringing children into the world as fast as the laws of nature would permit," but who, since they had used his remedy had never been enciente, and who are now "enjoying the best of health." From this experience he reaches the conclusion that "the remedy is an effectual one when properly used, and at the same time is harmless." Then follows this remarkable paragraph, addressed to his fellow practitioners.

> Let me caution you never to write a prescription for this remedy. The knowledge of these remedies should not become public property, for few women would consent to endure the pangs of child-birth, if they were in possession of the knowledge of so simple and yet so effective a remedy.

The italics are my own, as in all other quotations in this article. Immediately following the foregoing warning of Dr. Monroe's, the editor, Dr. C. F. Taylor, adds his, in these words:

> We wish to emphasize the last paragraph of the above. The physician should not only be thoroughly convinced that it is extremely important from a medical point of view that his patient should not become pregnant, but he should consult his conscience long before allowing himself to take a hand in this kind of business, and when he does so the patient should not know how or where to get the preparation except through him.

Next comes an anonymous contributor, who reasons that, as men and women will marry so long as there is no law to prevent [and he might have added, Will associate, law or no law] and will consort regardless of inherited or acquired disease, and so long as conception may follow this association, the question "has resolved itself down to one thing, and that is, what shall be done to prevent conception without injury to the woman's health?" Then he makes his suggestions as to the best kind of preventative. Instantly the frightened editor brackets two sticksful of protesting comment, the most striking of which I subjoin:

> In part of the above contribution not printed, the writer seems to think we should "let it be known" for the benefit of suffering women. We must insist all the time that this is a subject that should engage the physician's most careful and conscientious attention in any given case, and that to give out general information upon this subject is not to be thought of. How many men and women in your practice would shirk the duties of parenthood if they knew how, and thus miss the greatest joys of life? How many children would there be in your community if only those that are wanted would come?

Finally, Dr. F. F. Jackson devotes a few words of comment to each of the preventatives in most common use, and then tells the other doctors what he thinks is the best yet devised. He would make this an indispensable part of the wife's toilet outfit, and closes with the quietly suggestive remark that it is "worth consideration whether or not controlling the quantity would not enhance the quality of the product." This gives the editor the opportunity to fire his last warning gun:

> We have avoided and resisted the discussion of this subject in these columns for a number of years. That the use of this knowledge has a legitimate place in the practice of medicine, there can be no doubt. Yet we wish to impress the importance of making the application of it the subject of mature judgment and deepest conscience. We will further ask that this issue of the "Medical World" be specially guarded from the hands of the lay public.

The piteous pleas of Dr. Monroe and Dr. Taylor for the retention of their monopoly move me nearly to tears. I am affected almost as profoundly and lachrymosely as I am when I read a diatribe of a Catholic priest against freedom of conscience or civil marriage or the half-wailing, half-angry protest of a Protestant dominie against the competition of the theater and the Sunday newspaper with the pulpit. It is a burning shame—I say it boldly—that any woman should be so unfeeling as to try to starve the struggling doctors by taking care of her own body. It is of a piece with the miserable Protestant heresy which dispensed with the services of the clerical medicine-man in seeking the cure of souls. See what are the consequences of a bad precedent! Why, come to think the matter over seriously, is it not infringing on the prerogatives of the doctors when a presumptuous man guards against taking cold, or keeps sober, and so preserves his health? Is he not taking bread right out of the physician's mouth? What business has he to thus interfere with the orderly processes of the universe? Does not he realize that he is only an insignificant unit of the "lay public," and that laymen have never amounted to much in comparison with the sacred priesthoods?

We have long been accustomed to the demand that woman attend strictly to the work for which nature created her, and it is constantly dinned into our ears that the "true woman" asks nothing better than to be the mother of as many children as it pleases heaven to bestow upon her. But now come St. George Mivart and Drs. Monroe and Taylor with the solemn and emphasized assurance that the one creature selected by nature to perpetuate the human race is so ill-fitted for the labor she is designed to perform that she would let us go to the demnition bow-wows if she only knew of a "simple" and "effective" preventative of conception! She sums up in herself, vociferously insist the popular romancers, all the graces and all the virtues of our poor, frail humanity, but after all she is so immoral as to care nothing for the future of the race so only she can escape "the pangs of child-birth"! The egoistic shirk! Despite the fact that nature has made her "the matrix of the generations" she would abandon generation instanter if it were not for the self-sacrificing men, who insist with Spartan heroism that she perform her duty, amid the thunderous applause of the galleries and the medical monopolizers of knowledge.

Seriously, what do these gentlemen think of the exhibition they are making of themselves? Consider for a moment what their declarations involve. Stripped of all unnecessary fripperies of moral ornamentation, they say that the race would become extinct if it were not for ignorance. That is the gist of their assertions. No wonder Yahveh was exercised in spirit when Eve tasted of the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge. With a prophetic eye he saw down "the aisles of time" that the day was coming when only the firm hand of the altruistic doctor would interpose between his crowning work and ignominious suicide. "Seriously," I said in the beginning of this paragraph, but really, it is too much to expect one to be serious on such an occasion as this. The comedy is too good for one to keep a straight face through the whole performance. However, we will make another attempt to gravely examine these rare specimens of gall. If it be true, as asserted, that woman is so much less moral than man that were it not for the gallant doctors she would send the race tumbling into the gulf of oblivion to escape a little trumpery pain herself, what is the meaning of all the centuries-old rhodamontade concerning her superior purity, heroism and devotion? And what is the use of trying to secure a "single standard" of morals by eliminating man's and adopting woman's for everybody if the result is to be the wiping out of the whole crowd? According to Mivart, Taylor & Co., woman would annul the "primal decree of the universe" if only some doctor would for a moment forget his high duty as Race Conservator and write a preventative prescription for popular consumption. Great Grundy! On what a slender thread we dangle over the abyss!

"HOW MANY CHILDREN WOULD THERE BE IN YOUR COMMUNITY IF ONLY THOSE THAT ARE WANTED WOULD COME?" asks Dr. Taylor. Significant question! It suggests to us a multitude of thoughts, none of them the most pleasant. It tells us that even reactionary doctors realize the fact that enforced motherhood is very prevalent. But so far from deploring the unfortunate condition of things, they appear to regard it as unavoidable, if not desirable. They even seem to think it is natural, within the narrower meaning of the word, for they probably look upon the agonies of parturition as unescapable, and, if so, then enforced motherhood is to remain as a permanent factor in the race problem. While there are women who, if they could, would use preventatives to avoid the sufferings of maternity, it is imperatively necessary, from the view-point of these doctors, to keep them in ignorance. To keep them in ignorance in regard to the prevention of conception, it is essential that they shall be on a low plan of intelligence generally. So, as before said, if these physicians are to be believed, the only hope of the race is ignorance.

What has sexual rationalism to say? This, in brief. No obligation rests upon any one to remain in this world as a sufferer. If the balance of sensations is against happiness, the individual, freed from superstitions, finds no occasion to make a martyr of himself. And the probability is, also, that his continued existence as a sufferer will be more of a hindrance than a help to his fellows, for cheerfulness in our surroundings is an important contributory factor to our happiness. Applying this fundamental principle to the question of motherhood, we can see no valid reason why a woman should consent to conceive if, so far as she can estimate probabilities, the result will be for her more painful than pleasant. If she believes that her child will not have an equal chance of happiness in life with the children of other women, more fortunately situated, she will feel that she will suffer in sympathy with the child, if she has it, and so, if she is a rational person, she will use the preventative. It would be no more sensible for her to take too great risks than it would be for a person about to submit to a painful surgical operation to refuse to have an anæsthetic used. When anæsthetics were first brought to public notice the clerical priesthood made a great to-do about the presumption of man in thwarting the beneficent intentions of his maker, who invented pain for man's own good. But I presume that even Drs. Taylor and Monroe have got beyond the reach of that superstition. If there is indeed danger that the race is to become extinct through the aversion of women to bearing pain, then all I have to say is that it is a most salutary danger. It may induce even complacent conservatives, in the medical fraternity and elsewhere, to set about the study of some very serious problems in physiology, pathology and sociology. They may inquire, for instance, why it is that in countries producing more than an abundance for everybody, some few riot in useless luxury, while millions are on the verge of destitution, if not actually suffering the pangs of physical hunger. They may want to know if it would not be better that preventatives were used to such an extent that child mortality could be cut down to something considerably less than fifty per cent. of those born, than to continue to fill the purlieus of our cities with fragile and diseased little ones foredoomed to a losing battle with the wolf of want. They may ask if it is not possible to so diet and exercise that the pains of parturition can be reduced to a minimum, and to this latter question they will receive the answer that the excruciating agonies of motherhood are not decreed by an irrevocable fiat of nature, that the question of comparatively painless child-birth has already been solved. In a word: Let us welcome the rebellion of woman against pain; all progress has been made through the effort to secure easier conditions of life; we ever, both as individuals and as a race, inevitably seek the line of least resistance. "A better world" means always and only a world with less pain, with more pleasure.

Love is in the physical and moral world the force of forces, the health of health. He sins grievously who curses love after having experienced its delights. The last sigh of expiring voluptuousness should be a benediction to life.—Mantegazza.

Cleveland Notes.—Censorship of Mails.

The notes of Thomas Lees, printed elsewhere in this issue, must largely take the place of my intended report of meetings and observations while in the Forest City. Contrary to expectations my winter outing has been prolonged until nearly the end of January. Reports from office being such as to put my mind at ease, and having been urged to utilize the vacation to begin a long deferred sketch of personal history,—work that can better be done away from office than in it, I accepted the kind hospitality of our good Cleveland friends, Elizabeth H. Russell and Tillie and Thomas Lees to begin the long promised work. Whether the result will justify expectations remains to be seen. Another cause of delay to return to office is the oft repeated request of the managers of the Putnam and Collins memorial meeting here that I should remain and take part therein. Also the extreme cold weather of the past few days has been an additional cause.

Omitting for the present any report of meetings in which I have had the honor and the pleasure of taking part, I wish to say that among the daily papers of Cleveland the "Recorder" seems to take the most decided stand against the encroachments of centralized power in the hands of the "elected ones" and their appointers, at Washington, D. C. In its issue of yesterday, the 26th, under the head, "Censorship of the Mails," its leading editorial says:

"To criticize the postal department for denying the use of the mails for immoral, illegal or fraudulent purpose is an ungracious duty. This is so because many thoughtless people do not distinguish the dangers of crime from the greater dangers of some modes of restricting crime. It is quite possible, however, to do more harm by improper restrictions than by the crimes against which they are interposed. When such cases occur it becomes a duty to criticize the restrictions.

"We are led to these observations by the report that the use of the United States mails has been denied to a collecting agency of Ravenna, Ohio. The agency is charged with carrying on a blackmailing business. Whether the charge is true or not we have no means of knowing. The question has been decided arbitrarily, without judge or jury, by the post-master general. We may assume, however, that he believes the charge to be true. But whether he does or not, he acts as an irresponsible censor.

"The objection to this is two fold. Conceding for the moment the right of the government to close the mails against particular persons for good reasons, it is a right which cannot be safely exercised without an opportunity to those persons to be heard in their own defense before a jury. But even the right cannot be safely conceded. If the government have that right in one case it has it in all cases. If it may empower the postmaster general to deny the use of the mails for the transmission of fraudulent circulars, it may deny their use for the transmission of anything else. The question involved is the question of free speech and free press. To make the postmaster general a censor of business circulars and letters, is a long stride toward making him, so far as the mails are concerned, a censor of political and religious discussion.

"The true and safe way of dealing with the mails is to open them to all persons without restriction, holding each person responsible for the use he makes of them. Many years ago, this view was sustained with reference to abolition publications. An attempt having been made to close the mails against such publications, Webster, Clay and their great associates in the senate, though they regarded abolition literature as pernicious, insisted that postoffice officials could not be made censors,—that to make them so for any purpose, would be an infraction of the principle upon which the freedom of our institutions rests.

"Those senators acted upon the wise doctrine that everyone must be free to use the mails for any postal purpose, being accountable to the criminal law for abuses of the right. But later, in a lottery case, the supreme court, less sensitive to abstract principles of liberty, conferred upon congress unlimited power over the mails, and since then congress has in certain cases delegated that power to the postmaster general. Hence the present censorship. But principles cannot be violated with impunity. If this censorship continues we may expect to see its powers widely extended."

It is a hopeful sign when a leading daily of one of the principal cities of the United States, enters a protest so bold and manly as this. It indicates that a healthful reaction against ecclesiastic control of civil government has set in. Now if the "Recorder" will define what acts shall come under the regulation of "criminal law"—if its editor will take the only logical and consistent ground that there can be no such thing as a crime against government, or against 'the people," except such acts as clearly invade the personal right of individuals—some woman, man or child—if he will champion the Spencerian ethical code, viz.: "Everyone has the right to do as he wills so long as he does not invade the equal right of others,"—then the "Cleveland Recorder" will have achieved distinction as a champion of equal liberty for all and special privileges for none, of which any journal might well be proud.

The Editor in the Forest City.

TO LILLIAN HARMAN, ASSOCIATE EDITOR OF LUCIFER:—Thinking your readers, many of them at least, would like to hear something of the doings of the editor in chief, Moses Harman, while here in Cleveland, O., please grant the writer a little space in the greatly improved quarto weekly, Lucifer the Light Bearer.

Although arriving just in time to participate in New Year's festivities, our always welcome friend, who seems to enjoy a social time as well as the next one, has kept both eyes wide open to the business purpose of his coming; for notwithstanding the private social receptions that have been tendered him since his arrival, he has inquired into the various economical, industrial, political, religious and social societies based on reform in Cleveland, met with many of them in their public meetings, and addressed several of the societies at length, on invitation; notably the Franklin Club, whose object is political and economic reform; also The Children's Progressive Lyceum, or Spiritualist's Sunday school,—for the spiritual and moral unfoldment of our children, not only those whose parents are Spiritualists but also those of agnostics, and liberals of all shades of opinion met therein.

Cleveland has two such Sunday schools, the East and West Side Lyceums, the only two freethought schools in the city. That we should have a score or more such training schools, is evidenced by the bigotry and intolerance recently exhibited by "The Church of Christ," ("Christian scientists,") in preventing the spiritualists from occupying a hall that adjoins theirs in the Pythian Temple, after the trustees of the Lyceum had made terms and arranged to move in, that it might celebrate its thirty-first anniversary with appropriate exercises.

The "Cleveland Leader" commenting on the matter said, "The Christian scientists plainly informed the treasurer of the Temple that the spiritualists must move out, or they would; although their quarters were on the opposite sides of the hallway. An exhibition of narrowness such as this is hardly credible in this day of comparative free thought, and by a religious sect, that has for one of its cardinal axioms—'All is GOOD, there is no evil.'"

So you see the battle for freethought is not yet won. While the thirty-one years work of our Cleveland Lyceum has won many victories, and conquered much bigotry and prejudice, it has yet, it seems, much more hard fighting to do, before free thought and free speech is triumphant in this city.

The Cleveland "Leader" of the 18th, in alluding to the trouble, in its report of the Lyceum's celebration, last Sunday said:

The Spiritualists of Cleveland yesterday, at least that portion of them that are members, scholars, and friends of the Children's Progressive Lyceum, and who had arranged for the celebration of the thirty-first anniversary of the organization, in the Pythian Temple, spent most of yesterday morning in walking between the temple and Memorial Hall, their old place of meeting. There was a misunderstanding between the trustees of the Pythian Temple and the Spiritualists' organization, but after much vexation and considerable walking back and forth as Memorial Hall was found locked up, the janitor not expecting the Lyceum to meet there, word was at last received by the people standing outside that the Lyceum might hold its celebration in Pythian Hall, as it was advertised to take place there.

The hall was well filled with tired scholars and friends. The Lyceum session was presided over by Mr. Arthur Davies, the assistant conductor, and Miss Mabel McCaslin, the guardian. After a few of the regular exercises, an excellent programme by the following scholars was given. . . .

On the presiding officer calling for remarks from the adult friends, Mr. Thomas Lees, as one of the oldest members, being called upon, stepped to the platform, and after giving a brief history of the organizing of the Lyceum in old Temperance Hall, in 1866, by Andrew Jackson Davis, he said: "For thirty-one years this Children's Lyceum has had a hard struggle for existence, but running through that period of time a few brave souls, imbued with the truth and worth of the Spiritual philosophy, have nobly stood by it, unpopular as it has been, and is yet. Spiritualism could not be otherwise than unpopular, because its teachings were in direct opposition to the erroneous dogmas of the church—the popular religion of the day. The cardinal feature of modern Spiritualism, after its proof of continued life and possible communication with those in spirit life, is, that character and not creed is the best and only safe passport into the beyond. I must confess that for years after I became a Spiritualist fears of the truth of this would arise and at times almost overwhelm me, for at those times I felt if our teachings on this point were not true, I was not only jeopardizing my own soul but the souls of our children when I was advocating these views as conductor of this Lyceum.

"But, friends, those fears are now unknown, and the world is fast coming to our philosophy, and I have no hesitancy in saying, in this my 'youth of old age," that I would rather pass into the beyond, having lived true to the teachings of our philosophy, than rely on any of the creeds of so-called orthodoxy for my future salvation. While our Lyceum, so far, has not been the outward success the founder of the Lyceum system and Spiritualists generally had hoped for it, I feel sure that the thousands of children trained in our Sunday school have felt its marked effect for good in their lives, and it has been a powerful factor in the disintegrating of old creeds. So I feel glad I have been a worker for the past thirty years in the Children's Progressive Lyceum of Cleveland, the oldest Lyceum with a continuous history in the country, and I hope to aid in the work the balance of my earthly days."

On Mr. Lees taking his seat Mr. John Critchley, who happened to be in the hall, arose and said: "I was present at the organization of the Children's Lyceum by Andrew Jackson Davis, and I made one of the greatest mistakes of my life in not joining it." Prior to a good collection being taken up Mr. Lees urged on the friends, especially Spiritualists, to stand fast by the Lyceum, and closed by reciting Longfellow's beautiful poem of "The Children."

I am pleased to report that Lucifer's editor, who gave a capital talk to our children on Sunday in our Lyceum session, had several opportunities of meeting in a social way many of the Lyceum workers, who probably are as much interested in and as well prepared for his special work, as any other class o freethinkers. Mr. Harman's parlor talks on "Free Motherhood" and sexology in general while not always convincing to his attentive listeners, were always well received and freely commented on; all giving him credit for the great ability with which he handled the delicate subject, and the honesty that seemed to impel him onward in the discussion of this generally tabooed, yet vital subject. His methods to attain Free Motherhood, were questioned by many—his motives were questioned by none.

While here in Cleveland, Mr. Harman was in great demand by all Liberals who knew of his presence here. At a regular meeting of the Franklin Club he was appointed chairman of a committee to draft resolutions of sympathy and respect in regard to the tragic transition of Samuel P. Putnam and May Collins,—which resolutions were published in the Cleveland "Plain Dealer," and other city papers,—and will be probably in Lucifer. A public memorial meeting is to be held shortly in this city.

Mr. Harman's second visit to Cleveland will long be remembered with pleasure by the Liberals of this city, and by himself, I hope. It would seem that Lucifer's subscription list should be greatly increased by the thorough canvas of its editor among the liberals while here, which consideration will, it is hoped, compensate the acting editor, in a measure, for the absence of her father. When will it be your turn, Lillian, to take a rest from the daily grind of labor, and to visit round among your Cleveland and other readers? "All work and no play" makes Jill a dull girl. Fraternally yours, THOMAS LEES.

Thought is the first faculty of man; to express it is one of his first desires: to spread it, his dearest privilege—Raunal.

"The Old and the New Ideal."*

BY J. W. GASKINE.

The above is the title of a new book by Emil F. Ruedebusch, and a few words of explanation may be of use in bringing it to the attention of thoughtful persons who seek a sober solution of the troublous and vexing questions of sex, for this is what the book offers on its inner title page: "A solution of that part of the social question which pertains to love, marriage, and sexual intercourse."

Mr. Ruedebusch treats his subject in the scientific spirit; that is, in his examination of the parts of it, he goes for facts—reality—seeking the exact truth, and firmly though courteously, setting aside solutions which have heretofore been accepted as conclusive, because they are found in contradiction of the truth.

In a general sense the whole human society, gradually developing in the course of evolution, may be said to be in an experimental state, and from imperfect knowledge, not knowing precisely what is right or what is wrong, about anything. Social usages become established from mere habit, the habit originating under the promptings of passion and ignorance, and once established, though of the most absurd and even cruel nature, they form opinion; and this opinion is supported not only by the laws but by another authority even more potent, resulting from another form of ignorance—the belief in spirits,—at the head of whom is a great spirit called God, the author of all things and consequently of institutions, which henceforth become absolutely right and beyond criticism or improvement.

Such is the force of opinon of this kind, that usages of the most painful character often prevail for ages, as for instance the binding of the foot amongst the Chinese; the ideal of a foot being fixed beyond question in the mind, its attainment is sought for by the mass of human beings, with as entire indifference to suffering as to the consideration of whether it is, actually the best kind of foot.

And so with marriage, love and sexual intercourse, in our own Christianised society—certain usages building up from the wants and conditions of barbarism, have finally developed by force of habit and common education into a belief about those matters, quite heedless of its own imperfection, and dogmatic-ally giving us an ideal which we must train ourselves up to, whether or no.

It is this ideal, which the book of Mr. Ruedebusch critically examines, and which he terms—"The Old Ideal."

The two distinctive features of the "Old Ideal" are—first, to stamp the whole sexual part of human beings as low, evil and so dangerous, that full knowledge about it should be shut away from all but physicians: second, the affirmation that love, or that feature of love which finds its expression through the action of the sexual organs, must properly exist o .ly between two persons who have agreed to love each other, and no other, for life.

It does not matter that the truth of these positions of the "Old Ideal" is denied by conspicuous facts in every day experience; the ideal is fixed in the minds as correct, and the facts to the contrary are disregarded under the overwhelming sway of public opinion.

Mr. Ruedebusch, however, hopes that the "Old Ideal" may be discarded, if its errors and their evil effect upon health and happiness are stated with sufficient clearness, which he endeavors to do in his book. And he proposes in its place, an ideal founded upon a fuller understanding of the physical and passional nature of the human being—a "New Ideal" in conformity with reason, after sufficient investigation, in contradistinction to the "Old Ideal" which we have really inherited thoughtlessly from the ignorance and brutality of our savage ancestors.

What the "New Ideal" is, can only be fully understood by reading Mr. Ruedebusch's very interesting work. The author declares it has given him new joy in life. "Cheer up," he writes, "all ye despondent souls; discard the old superstitious ideal of love and sex, and accept the new one. Then we will soon create such conditions that the lives of all believers of the 'New Ideal' will know many a blissful hour—when each one can say truly what I say now, being filled with hope and joyous expectation—'Oh, beautiful world, I love thee!'"

The destiny of any nation at any given time depends on the opinions of its young men under twentyfive.—Gœthe.

THE RIGHTS OF MINORITIES. So long as the government is in the hands of persons, whether a larger or smaller proportion of the whole population, who conceive it to be their right to mold it as they please, the law of might prevails, and no appreciable gain results from extending the suffrage. The law of right begins when it is admitted that the minority have rights which the majority are bound to respect. For two men, the majority, to levy a tax upon the property of a third man, and to distribute the proceeds without due regard to his interests and his will, is robbery, even if organized into a government. There is no government yet established in which the rights of minorities are protected or properly recognized. The most important step now to be taken with regard to the right of suffrage, is to make it obligatory upon each person upon whom it is conferred, or on reaching the voting age and offering to vote, to promise to exercise the right always, to the best of his ability, for the benefit of the whole community; and the like obligation find rest upon every officeholder. Such a promise may be disregarded by many; but it will be kept by an ever increasing proportion of the community, developing towards reorganization, the really honest.

The great cause of revolution is this—that while nations move onward constitutions stand still.—Macaulay.

When the spirit of liberty has fled, and truth and justice are disregarded, private rights can be easily sacrificed under forms of law.—Kent's Commentaries.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXV.

But now? One thing Imelda had achieved. She had led Norman into the realms of thought. She had made him think as he had never thought before. He now began to see the real cause of human misery. Asking a few well directed questions he soon had the missing links needed to supplement Imelda's life history. She told him of the fair haired girl whom she loved better than a sister; the girl whose mother's life had been blighted through that self-same marriage curse. She told him of that cherished friend who through the same curse had seen a worshiped mother laid beneath the sod—which tale she ended by requesting him to write those friends; to become acquainted with them; to test their friendship. Norman agreed to do this, and not many days later a letter of his was speeding across the prairies bearing his worded desire to know better those who had in earlier days befriended his Imelda, and who wielded such influence over her.

But to those enthralled in love's golden fetters time speeds on rapid wings. When Norman looked at his watch he found it pointing to half past ten. A pang smote Imelda's heart as she thought of the lonely watcher up in the sick chamber, and hastily sought to disengage herself from the encircling arms of her lover. A half dozen more love-laden kisses and the young girl was bounding across the open grounds followed by the fond eyes of her lover who watched her until she disappeared within the portals of the house ere he wended his way homeward.

No sooner had Imelda stepped into the hall, softly closing the door behind her, than, from the open door to the right, leading into the drawing room, stepped Lawrence Westcot. Imelda drew back. She did not care to encounter anyone just now, least of all Lawrence Westcot. Planting himself directly across her path, but speaking with faultless courtesy he said,

"Miss Ellwood, will you grant me the favor of a few moments conversation?" at the same time holding open the door for her to pass through. Imelda paused, hesitating. What could Lawrence Westcot desire to say to her? Besides it was already late. Her conscience smote her for having absented herself so long from the sick room, and she certainly felt no desire to be alone with this man at this hour of the evening. But he was waiting, holding the door for her to pass through, quite as a matter of course. Much as she was disinclined to do so she yet felt that she could not refuse without appearing rude, and so, reluctantly passing him she entered the room, while he closed the door after them.

The room was dimly lit, as before when she had entered it earlier in the evening. Imelda paused under the singly burning jet. He came forward and turned it to a brighter blaze, then wheeled forward a chair for her to be seated, but which she declined, shaking her head in a positive manner.

"I beg your pardon, but I would rather not, Mr. Westcot. It is time I return to Alice. Mrs. Boswell kindly relieved me this evening of several hours of responsibility. I have already overstayed my time. I do not wish to give it the appearance of an imposition, so if you have anything to say to me I must beg of you to hasten."

She had taken a step or two backward and stood with her hand resting upon the back of the chair Westcot had placed for her, the soft folds of the white shawl that had been loosely thrown over her head and shoulders, the glow of health and happiness upon her cheek, and in the dark brown eyes—Lawrence Westcot felt the magic beauty of the picture before him. It was doubtful if he heard a word of what she had spoken; certain it was that he paid no attention to it. Suddenly Imelda became conscious of his burning gaze, and in a moment her face was dyed from brow to chin with a hot wave of color, and again she spoke:

"If you have something to tell me, Mr. Westcot, will you please do so without loss of time? I do not wish that Alice should be waiting."

"Let her wait," he said hastily, huskily. "She is not wanting for anything. I have just come from there. Mrs. Boswell is with her and can manage very well. Besides, why should you make such a prisoner of yourself? The nurse is paid for her work; let her do it. A little while longer will not hurt her."

Utterly surprised, Imelda for the moment was unable to speak, but almost instantly recovering her self possession,

"Was it to tell me this you have asked me to come in here?" He heeded not the withering scorn in her voice, but stepping nearer he possessed himself of one of her hands.

"Why should I not tell you that, and a great deal more if I choose? True, you never gave me a chance, but can you not see that I madly love you?"

"Sir! You forget yourself!" Imelda snatched her hand from him and stepped several paces backward. Nothing daunted the next moment he again was at her side.

"Why should I not tell you, and why should you not listen? Do I not know your views on love and marriage? According to them you cannot deem my love for you a crime because I am a married man." With these words he attempted again to take her hand, but she, by mustering all her strength pushed him from her with such force as to almost unbalance him.

"How dare you!" she articulated. The face that only a few moments ago was dyed scarlet was now ashen in its pallor.

"I dare it because I love you," came in low, almost hissing tones from lips that were now pale as hers, while his black eyes glowed like living coals.

"Do you think I will meekly surrender you to that—no! I will not call names—to that so-called friend of mine? I tell you no! a thousand times no! I acknowledge no barriers, as I know you do not, and I swear to you that you must and shall be mine!"—and ere Imelda was aware of his intention he had gained her side, his arms like bands of iron were laid about her shoulders, and the next instant she felt his hated kisses upon her lips. For a moment she was powerless, and only for a moment, when with the strength of desperation she tore herself from his embrace.

"You are the most despicable creature upon this earth! I will tell you what barriers stand between us. First and foremost your utter lack of manhood. By whatever despicable means you may have obtained an inkling of my views, let me tell you that you have failed, utterly failed to get the least gleaning of the truth. Know that a creature so wholly devoid of principle and honor may never hope to win the favor of a free woman. Know you that love can neither be forced nor bought. When you come to realize and understand this you may speak to me again—not until then."

With an imperious movement she swept by him, leaving him bewildered and, for the moment, totally subdued. Had he failed to understand her? What a glorious creature! and what superb scorn. Did she know what stood between Alice and him? At the thought of Alice a dark frown swept over his face. What was the meaning of that?

Upon winged feet Imelda flew up the broad stairway and into the sick room. Her strength was at an end. Staggering she would have fallen, had not the nurse seen her condition in time and caught her in her arms. Carefully she laid her upon the lounge. Alice was sleeping, as indeed the last few days and nights she had slept almost constantly, which fact enabled the nurse to pay all her attention for the next half hour to this new patient. Finally Imelda returned to consciousness, but only to break into an uncontrollable fit of weeping. For a little while the nurse permitted this fit to have full sway, but when the storm had spent itself and Imelda became more composed she stepped to the stand where there was quite an array of medicines. Mixing a cool soothing draught and handing it to the sobbing girl, she said:

"Take this," and, quite as a matter of course Imelda drank the cooling drink.

"Now," continued Mrs. Boswell, "go to your room and lie down." But this time she was not so readily obeyed. Imelda's frame shook as with a chill.

"I would rather not. Please let me remain where I am. I shall soon recover and be all right again."

"No! no! the sick room is no place to sleep. I insist that you go to your own room and bed, if you would avoid being sick yourself."

But Imelda on no account would have traversed the lonely hallway again tonight, for fear of meeting in some shadowy nook the man she had just left below in such a storm of passion. Mrs. Boswell soon realized that for some unaccountable reason Imelda seemed afraid, though this was a weakness she had not hitherto noticed in the girl, but she understood too well that she was in need of perfect composure and rest, and the sick room was no place for these. Stepping to the bedside of the sleeping patient she bent over her and listened for a moment to the quiet breathing; then she said:

"Come, I will go with you. It will be perfectly safe to leave our patient for a few moments." Then taking the agitated girl by the hand, she led her through the hallway to her own room. Lighting the gas jet she next turned down the bed clothes and quietly but quickly assisted her to disrobe and helped her into the snowy night robe. She would then have tucked her into her bed but Imelda refused, as she wished to fasten the door after the retreating form of the nurse, who thereupon returned to the bedside of the sleeping Alice to watch the night away when she herself had expected to spend it in needed rest and sleep.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Walter Breen, Omaha, Neb.:—I am glad Putnam was cremated. I saw that William Scudamore advocated it and was himself committed to urn instead of to the coffin when this life terminated. People of our way of thinking seem to gravitate towards reforms all round.

Nellie M. Mastick, Junction City, Wash.:—Please send Lucifer six months to each of inclosed names. I like the change to quarto very much. It will be so much handier and also wear better, and I like to have them wear well. I have parted with many of mine, but have never been guilty of destroying one yet.

I hope we shall have the story in book form. I have sent away several numbers of my paper containing it.

Flora W. Fox, Rochester, Minn.:—I want to congratulate you upon the greatly improved, because more convenient, form of Lucifer and send in my dollar to help along in these "Prosperity" times. Hope the Light-Bearer will continue to turn the search-light of common sense and progressive thought upon all the tabooes. They will consecutively vanish.

I will take two copies (paper) of "Hilda's Home." It is good, and will be an admirable missionary document if it continues as logical, and no doubt it will.

Wm. P. Austin, Poplar, Calif.:—Herein find twenty-five cents for which send Lucifer three months to the inclosed address. This is the second trial subscription I have sent in the last few weeks. With the first I requested you to send me little Virna's picture. Now I would like to have yours. The offer of yours and Virna's photographs is not only an inducement to get subscribers, but it is a help in obtaining them. These trial subscribers have considerable curiosity to see the photograph of a child of free love, to see how she compares with others Also, the photographs of radicals and their children are educators. People generally expect Anarchists and Free Lovers to be bad, mean looking people. When they see these Anarchists or their pictures they are agreeably surprised, so even pictures are educators.

An intelligent Hebrew woman, compelled to seek refuge from the lust of her legal owner or die, came to my home a week ago and I took her in. She thought he might get angry and come here and kill her, but it was sure death to live with him any longer, as inflammation and fever had already set in, as a result of the abuse. Her physician told her she would die, and offered to write a note for her to carry to her husband, but she told him it would do no good; he would not read it nor pay the least attention to anything the doctor would write or say; nor believe a woman could be injured in that way.

Long must we lament the untimely death of our noble brother and tireless worker, Samuel P. Putnam. Let us unite in the hope that many thousand such workers may arise from his ashes to batter down the strongholds of priestcraft and superstition.

My motto is this: Legal bonds of the matrimonial order are villainous and furnish all the food for slanders and obscenity hunters, while all love is pure, and it is impossible to change love into anything else.

REASONS FOR PARDONING FIELDEN NEEBE AND SCHWAB. By John P. Altgeld, Governor of Illinois. In this work the chief is conclusively proven that the prisoners did not have a fair trial, that they were unjustly condemned and that their imprisonment was an outrage and the Governor has the courage of his convictions. He does not "pardon" repentant criminals, but releases innocent victims of a judicial outrage. The history of the case is gone over from beginning to end and it comprises very valuable information. Price, 15 cents.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. I., No. 5. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, FEBRUARY 10, E. M. 297. [C. E. 1897.] WHOLE No. 64

For the Feast of Giordano Bruno, Philosopher and Martyr.

I.

Son of the lightning and the light that glows
Beyond the lightning's or the morning's light,
Soul splendid with all-righteous love of right,
In whose keen fire all hopes and fears and woes
Were clean consumed, and from their ashes rose Transfigured, and intolerable to sight
Save of purged eyes whose lids had cast off night,
In love's and wisdom's likeness whep they close,
Embracing, and between them truth stands fast,
Embraced of either; thou whose feet were set
On English earth while this was England yet,
Our friend that art, our Sidney's friend that wast,
Heart hardier found and higher than all men's past,
Shall we not praise thee though thine own forget?

II.

Light up thy light on us and on thine own,
O soul whose spirit on earth was as a rod
To scourge off priests, a sword to piece their God,
A staff for man's free thought to walk alone,
A lamp to lead him far from shrine and throne
On ways untrodden where his fathers trod
Ere earth's heart withered at a high priest's nod,
And all men's mouths that made not prayer made moan.
From bonds and torments and the ravening flame,
Surely thy spirit of sense rose up to greet
Lucretius, where such only spirits meet,
And walk with him apart till Shelley came
To make the heaven of heaven more heavenly sweet,
And mix with yours a third incorporate name.

The Fatal Folly of Ignorant Innocence.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

Last summer Mrs. Grannis, of New York, went on a crusade of investigation of Coney Island's vice. She wrote reports of the evils which she saw, heard and suspected, and the said reports were published in the Sunday "World." She wrote of one girl in particular, a beautiful young dancer, who told her that she did not like the life but continued in it because it was the only means of support of herself and her widowed mother. Mrs. Grannis gave the girl good advice, and warned her against the evil life; but if she told her of any opening through which she might find "respectable" employment, she failed to mention that fact in her report.

Two months later "La Belle Lillian" Hall's life ended. Quick consumption relieved her of the existence which Mrs. Grannis and the society whose mouthpiece Mrs. Grannis is, declared ruined. Mrs. Hall writes a letter to the "World," lamenting the "sin" of her child, and telling the story of her life. It seems that Lillian's parents were wealthy, lived at Long Branch, and kept "servants." She was the only living child. According to the mother's story, she had tutors who taught her to speak French and German, and she was brought up in the Episcopal faith and "received strict religious discipline." But there was no education or training which she could utilize to make herself self-supporting; it is evident that her parents considered it impossible that their dainty darling might ever find it necessary to earn her own living. Her mother assures the readers of the "World" that up to the time she was enticed from her home "she had no knowledge of the sin of the world."

Well, a few years ago the father lost his money, fell ill, and in two years died. The mother, who had evidently been brought up to be a useless household ornament, as she in turn reared Lillian, found herself able to do only plain sewing, for which she received fifty cents a day. When the father died she had only fifty dollars, and that she used to "partly defray the funeral expenses." She does not state where the rest of the money came from; but it is to be inferred that she borrowed it "Respect" must be shown the dead, even though the outward show of respect means starvation for the survivors.

Mrs. Hall says she endeavored to make a "comfortable home" for her daughter, but as she "was not able to be with her as much as a mother should be with a girl of her age, she being then about twenty," Lillian got into the company of girls who told her that there was a better living to be obtained by dancing than in depending on her mother's exertions.

Mrs. Grannis "points the moral" of this story, concluding with these words: "The so-called 'reformers' of our time might readily be dispensed with if the Church were truly alive to its privileges. Suggestive sensual exhibits are today one of the great sources which lead to degeneracy of the human race."

If Lillian Hall had not lived in such childish ignorance, had she received training in some pleasant employment by which she could earn her living, and had her mother shown her the results of excesses and dissipation, instead of keeping her in ignorance of the evil of the world, is it probable that this young girl would have voluntarily chosen the course which brought her to disease and death at twenty-two? Fancy the bitter irony of the phrase, "a comfortable home," to be provided for two women on an income of three dollars per week! Why, they could scarcely even live in a decent place in New York for that, leaving the factors of food and clothing entirely out of the problem. Such would be a bitter experience even for those accustomed to poverty and hardships. What wonder, then, that a girl utterly unfamiliar with any kind of physical deprivation, and ignorant of the dangers she would incur, should eagerly accept the first offer which promised relief from the grinding poverty with which she was totally unfitted to cope?

Mrs. Hall hugged her superstitions to the last. She evidently made no effort to find employment for her daughter. She thought it best to treat a young woman of twenty like a child, leaving her at home in uncongenial surroundings, head and hands unoccupied. It would seem that any one with the faintest gleam of "common sense" would know better. "As ye sow so shall ye reap." Lillian Hall was reared a helpless, beautiful living statue, fitted only to please the senses of men. It was expected that she would be the ornament of her father's home, and, later, of the home of her husband. Then, father and husband failing her, what could she do other than as she did?

It is a sad story, but it will be repeated again and again, thousands of times, until fathers and mothers learn to train their daughters to take care of themselves in all ways, and thus render it unnecessary for them to depend for their subsistence on the favor of any man, either for a life time in marriage or for a night outside that pale.

And similar results will follow such causes, regardless of the existence or suppression of all the "suggestive sensual exhibits" in the world.

The Right to Love and To Be Loved.

BY S. A. E. J.

The daily papers lately copied a letter from the Princess Chimay-Caraman to a Brussels paper, in which she gives the motives for her elopement with a Hungarian violinist, Jansci Rigo. She states that the neglect of her husband caused her affection to grow less, until she, weary of solitude, did what she calls "the irreparable." She goes on to say:

"I left my children, in order not to contaminate by my presence the pure snow of their minds, and I went away in order to avoid sullying the name of the man whom I respect, and who only committed one fault—that of marrying me, since his tastes for sport should have forbidden him to marry a woman of my sort. I was not able to make our home pleasant enough to keep my husband there."

In the mind of one acquainted with the latitude accorded to French and Belgian married women in sex matters, there can only be admiration for the courage of this highstrung and noble woman, who thus puts upon herself the chief blame for her rash act, and who thereby invites the contempt and ostracism of the world, when she might readily have avoided the same by simply becoming her lover's mistress, under the cover of her husband's roof and name.

But one must also regret that she, in accordance with a false code of honor, condemns in her own conscience the step she has taken, by speaking of the "contaminating" influence which her presence, when guilty of adultery, would have upon her children. If she had remained with her husband, although committing secret adultery with her lover, it could have had no sullying effect upon husband or children, if her relations to her lover were not discovered, at all events. Only her own mind, in that case, would have been subject to the unrest which such a secret would produce upon a conscience so sensitive.

But in taking the step she took, is it likely that she will be more happy? If we read between the lines of her letter we see a heart already quivering under its own sacrifice. She has sacrificed all that such a woman holds dearest in the world—her children, her home, her good name and position in society, all this is given up for the momentary satisfaction of a passion perhaps as fleeting, beyond which, when that has passed, lies the void.

How different would now be her position if her act had been the culmination point of lofty aspirations to free herself and her sex from sex slavery, a slavery imposed upon her by laws and customs in the making of which she or her sisters had no voice? Instead of standing condemned in her own conscience as a thing too vile even for the touch of her own innocent babes, she would now with uplifted head be proclaiming to the world her inalienable right to love and to be loved, commanding not alone the respect of those who might feel themselves most aggrieved by her act—because of the intensity of her convictions and her courage in carrying them into effect, but she would have been hailed by all truly liberal men and women as an emancipator of her sex, to whom instead of censure all honor and praise should be accorded.

It is this class of people who are unfortunate in their married life, as well as those women who illicitly become mothers, that we ought especially to reach through our propaganda, as they would form that element in present society for whom such phrases as "eternal love," "my only love," have lost much of their force, by their present failure to realize such ideals. These people would be open to conviction by argument because the citadel of inherited and inbred feelings has already been broken into by that most efficient battle-ax, pain experienced. For it is through their feelings and not through their intellects that people must be approached on this subject if we are to have a measure of success in our reformatory work.

For those to whom life has not yet revealed its bitter disappointments, in love and sex matters, theoretical dissertations upon the logical outcome of the present marriage institution, may be in order, but they will be few who, from mere principle and thorough intellectual appreciation, would join a free motherhood movement, to such extent at least that they should by act expose themselves to the opposition of society.

In Mr. Ruedebusch's new book we have received valuable aid to show the unfortunate in love and marriage a way out of their difficulties, and I think it no more than due to say that but for the unceasing, untiring efforts of the Light-Bearer, such a book would have few readers, if it could even have been written.

Coherence vs. Happiness.

BY ALBERT CHAVANNES.

I do not believe that a further discussion as to the respective merits of coherence or incoherence would specially interest your readers, so I shall not answer Mr. Walker's last article on the subject, but briefly state how I came to adopt the opinions I have professed.

I was raised to have a great respect for logic, and my parents daily impressed upon me the coherence of the arguments brought forward to support the Christian religion. I was taught that it is better to be right than to be happy, and even when I had accepted evolution and thrown Christianity overboard, I was a firm believer that to be right—coherent—was the true way to happiness, and for many years I used the weapons of logic to make converts to the rule of natural morality.

But as I progressed in my career I found to my surprise that the average men and women cared very little for logic, but were always ready to listen to suggestions that would help them to make their lives happier, and increase the number of their pleasant sensations.

I learned then, what I had never been taught before, that practice goes before theory, a truth which I find corroborated in Lucifer by your contributor, James S. Denson, who ought to be good authority for Mr. Walker. In No. 643 he says: "We must reason from facts to principles, and not from principles to facts."

A little observation showed me that the way to convert people, is first to induce them to act, and that when once they have acted, and found themselves the happier for it, they are ready to listen to arguments that will sustain them in their actions.

But I found also that I could hardly ever induce them to act as I desired without their being incoherent both with their avowed beliefs and with the remainder of their actions. So I came to look upon coherence as an obstacle to progress, and for years I have ceased to look for progress among those persons who pride themselves upon their logical powers.

I can probably better explain myself by taking for example a reform in which Mr. Walker and myself are both interested. I mean the increase of sexual independence among women. I believe I am within the limit when I say that nine-tenths of the women who at times take the control of their sexual conduct into their own hands, do so in opposition to their religious or social beliefs. I do not speak here of free lovers, but of the world at large, and of women of all sorts and conditions.

Now, I feel certain that if I could impress on all women the beauty of coherence, the cause of sexual freedom would receive a blow from which it would take years to recover. Sexual independence will be gained by practice, not by theory, by putting facts before principles.

The inducement to progress is the desire for happiness. Show to average men and women that a certain line of conduct will increase their happiness, and they will throw logic to the dogs, and make some advance in the right direction.

There are persons who are specially susceptible to logic, and I believe that Mr. Walker is well calculated to work among them, although I believe he will find them hard customers, but his ways are not my ways, and I know there are many reformers, who, like me, do not care if people are coherent, so they are willing to move onward.

In our line of work, we find incoherence of thoughts and actions a great help to induce many a person to act in such a way as will increase their happiness, and what I have said in opposition to Mr. Walker's position was to offset the impression that might have been caused by his sweeping condemnation.

Women's Religion as Well as Their Names Change at Marriage.

The religion of princes is like their conscience, very elastic. The present Empress of Russia was a Lutheran; she became a member of the Greek Church for the purposes of marriage. The Princess Helene who has been married to the Italian heir apparent, the Prince of Naples, was a member of the Greek Church; she has become a Roman Catholic.—Secular Work.

Facts like these show how little principle there is in the old established religions. They exist, not as a vital fire in the human heart, but as institutional agencies, as great corporations without souls, as machines to co-operate with despotic governments, whenever possible, to subjugate and oppress the people, to make them mental and spiritual slaves that they may be ridden, booted and spurred the more easily by the representatives of king craft and priest craft.

A Believer in Intellectual Honesty.

BY CYRUS W. COOLRIDGE.

Mr. James S. Denson states in Lucifer that "an attempt is now being made to have it appear that the lamented May L. Collins was not a personal friend of the representative social radicals of the day." I cannot tell how many representative social radicals she counted as her friends, but I know that the talented and ill-fated girl was a radical herself and that she never hesitated to express her views. I take the liberty of quoting the following from a letter which she wrote to me a few months ago: "I marvel when I hear such people as Helen Gardener and Mr. Flower, both of whom claim to have outgrown the old fashioned ideas, wanting the age of consent raised to eighteen years, instead of wanting it eradicated entirely." Surely this is not the voice of one who worships at Mrs. Grundy's shrine. Whether she deserved praise or blame for her views is a matter of opinion. We cannot expect old fogies to indorse her views on social questions any more than we can expect Dr. Talmage to indorse Ingersoll's views on religion, but why should anyone try to make it appear that she was not a radical? What can be gained by it? Let it be understood that our young friend, whose death was a shock to hundreds of people, believed in intellectual honesty. She had very decided opinions and she did not use words to conceal her thoughts.

Sociologic Lesson. No XXIX.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

THE ORIGIN OF MONEY. The first exchanges of individual property were by barter. Each produced that which he could make to the best advantage, and exchanged his products for articles made by others. If the articles he made were perishable, and he could not readily dispose of them for articles that he wanted to use, he would next exchange them for other articles which he could keep, and for which others would finally give him what he wanted. These intermediate articles exercised the function of money, just so far as they were valuable, requiring labor for their production, durable, and in demand by other persons. Jewels were very early used in this way, especially by persons traveling; for jewels of very little bulk and weight could be exchanged anywhere for large amounts of other articles. Gold and silver were more convenient, from the ease with which their value could be ascertained, depending wholly upon their weight and the general demand for these metals, and not, as is the case with jewels, varying with the size and character of each gem. Gold and silver were coined simply to aid in determining the weight; and copper, a relatively cheaper metal, was used to save the necessity for very small coins. Since their first introduction these metals have always been money everywhere; and the more diversified the products of the labor of men, the more customary it has become to exchange those products first for money; since it was generally known with considerable accuracy how much of other products could be obtained for the money; and in the meantime the money would be imperishable. Thus in its origin the use of money has been entirely independent of legal considerations or enactments.

London is Being Slowly Secularized.

Perhaps the most important movement this year in Secular circles is the opening to the public on Sundays of the London museums and art galleries. But how many more years shall we have to wait before the public libraries are all unlocked, and may not the Tower of London be included in the list as a museum? We hope it will be soon at least.—Secular Work (London.)

Think of keeping the public libraries closed on Sundays through the influence of a class of men who claim to be moral and religious guides! What other reason is there than that the clergy think the people will rely more on books than on the "preached word" for instruction, and will find the recorded wisdom in the library more attractive than the drippings of the pulpit.

Mr. Tucker Corrected

Geo. E. Macdonald, in "The Truth Seeker."

Mr. Tucker remarks, apparently addressing myself: "I ask not your mercy, your forgiveness, or your love." I had not thought of asking him to accept either. If I correctly interpret the sensation which he produces in me, it is that of biliousness. The truth is, Tucker has used his "brand" so much that it is getting burnt out, like the breech of a musket too frequently fired. I remember that in 1888 he jabbed it at Putnam with the proclamation: "The time has come to publicly brand S. P. Putnam, president of the American Secular Union, as the miserable coward, hypocrite and wretch that he is." What had poor Putnam done? The circumstances were that a speaker at a convention of the God in-the-Constitution party had declared that human law had no binding force upon him; and Putnam, who called himself a Jeffersonian democrat, pointed out that the doctrine of the theocrat was identical with that of Herr Johann Most, to whose principles of disorder Freethought was accused of leading. Putnam also took occasion to observe that, as a matter of necessity, when a great number of people come together in social relations, there must be "a regard for what is called the voice of the majority under constitutional guarantees." Later, when he was in Southern California, I admitted to the columns of "Freethought" a letter from O. S. Barrett of Adrian, Mich., in which Putnam's editorial was commended for what it did not contain, the hanging of the Chicago revolutionists approved, and agitation in general condemned. On the whole, Barrett's letter was so barbarous and stupid that I as little thought of replying to it as Putnam thought of noticing the vituperations of Tucker. Now, in face of the fact, of which Tucker was informed, that Putnam never saw Barrett's letter, the editor of "Liberty," in his latest issue, avers that Putnam publicly accepted it as a compliment and fathered its sentiments; which is a falsehood. And so, Putnam being dead, Tucker brands him again as "essentially contemptible and base." In the same paper he says: "I ask only justice." Somebody ought to accommodate him.

Love demands law—not that, however, which is imposed from without but that which springs from its own majesty and delight. Freedom in itself is an education most noble and beautiful. Humanity is not a wild beast to be subdued and chained. On the whole it is right and means to do right. The grandeur of virtue is constantly imperative.—Samuel P. Putnam.

Chicago Secular Union.

At Handel Hall, Sunday eve the 29th, the Chicago Secular Union celebrated the anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine. The speakers were Mr. Solke, one of Chicago's rising young lawyers, and Prof. W. H. Chaney, of the Astrological college. The hall was well filled with attentive listeners, a good proportion of whom were ladies. Mr. Gammage, the president, made some very fitting remarks upon the duty of Freethinkers to join the organization and to actively help in carrying out the purposes of the "Nine Demands of Liberalism," which demands he then proceeded to read.

Cleveland Notes.

On Sunday the 24th, I had the honor and the pleasure of addressing, briefly three of Cleveland's most progressive societies, or social organizations—the Franklin Club, devoted to economic and governmental reforms, and the two Progressive Lyceums. While the primary object of these Lyceums is instruction and training for the young, physical as well as mental, the exercises are interesting and instructive to grown-up women and men also. The statement in regard to these reform Sunday schools, given by Thomas Lees, in last Lucifer is well worth careful consideration by Freethinkers everywhere, whether Materialistic or Spiritualistic in belief or philosophy. In no other department of needful endeavor are these reformers more sadly delinquent than in the matter of secular or non-theistic education for the young. Paraphrasing a little: The children of Superstition are wiser in their generation than the children of Reason. Chicago, with its many thousands of Liberals,—Materialists, Spiritualists, Theosophists, etc., has not one Freethought Sunday school, so far as I know, thus leaving the children and youth to the care of Christian Sunday Schools, there to imbibe superstitious theology, prejudice and hate towards the real reformers of the world.

On Wednesday eve, the 27th, by invitation of the managers, I read a short essay on "Secular Funerals" before the meeting held in honor of the memory of S. P. Putnam, May Collins, and Thomas Paine, at Wieber's Hall on the west side. Notwithstanding severity of the weather and scant advertisement, the attendance was quite respectable, a good portion being ladies. The meeting was called to order by Dr. L. S. Copper who made a very appropriate opening address. He was followed by H. H. Cline, whose subject was "Four Hundred Years of Free-thought." Mr. Cline spoke eloquently of Bruno, Voltaire, Shelley and other pioneers, incidentally saying that Shelley, as the "friend of woman's freedom anticipated the work of Brother Harman."

The next speaker was Mr. Peter Witt, another of the bright and eloquent young Freethinkers of Cleveland. His subject was "Thomas Paine," and seldom have I heard a better vindication of the work and worth of the "Author-Hero" of the American Revolution and chief apostle of Reason vs. Superstition, and of the Rights of Man as against the Rule of Kingcraft and Priestcraft.

Then came a poem on Thomas Paine by Miss Copper, daughter of the presiding officer. Owing to defect of hearing I failed to catch much of this poem but what I heard was decidedly good.

Another of Cleveland's bright galaxy of young men who espouse the cause of Secularism and of equal liberty for all, Claude Taylor, then followed with a splendid eulogium upon "S. P. Putnam and His Work," winding up with a brief but eloquent tribute to the memory of Thomas Paine.

Mr. C. Elton Blanchard, publisher of the Cleveland "Medical Times," then read a carefully prepared paper on May L. Collins, her record in confounding her teachers in school, her brief but brilliant career on the lecture platform, giving interesting extracts from letters, showing the remarkable precocity as well as maturity of her mind.

The next paper was by Edith Slade, one of the brightest and most successful of the lady teachers in the Cleveland public schools. The subject assigned to her by the management was "The Religion of My Mother," closing her address with some excellent reflections and criticisms upon the false and cruel standard of morality that would smirch the good name of a brilliant and every way admirable young woman because of the fact that her dead body was found in her room near the dead body of a man. As this address will probably be published in pamphlet form I forbear further mention here except to say that none of the speakers of the evening was more warmly applauded by the audience than was Edith Slade.

Then followed the talk on "Secular Funerals" already mentioned, and as this paper also will be published, if demand should justify, no analysis will be here attempted.

Last, though not least, on the regular program, was an original poem by Mrs. Mary Smith of Newburg, a suburb of Cleveland, on "Woman Born of Man"—I think was the title,—an unique and very amusing production, by one of Cleveland's best known and most honored workers in the cause of Secularism, and of all humanitarian reforms.

Then followed brief remarks by John Jacobs, R. G. Holt and others. Mr. Jacobs said he told Mr. Putnam, when at Cleveland, that we can have no secular freedom so long as we have the state. Mr. Holt spent most of his five minutes in commending Lucifer's championship of woman's freedom, as a most important yet much neglected part of secular agitation and education.

I forgot to say that as a prelude to the regular program the poem by "S. P. Putnam to D. M. Bennett," as printed in a late Lucifer, was read from the platform by J. H. Taylor, one of the workers on the "Silver Knight," an excellent reform paper published in Cleveland.

At the close, though the hour was late, Dr. Copper made a stirring address to the Freethinkers of Cleveland to revive their organization and again hold regular meetings, urging the necessity of vigilance and united action if we would preserve what liberties we have left us against further encroachments by the ever vigilant and ever aggressive church power. All in favor o such reorganization were requested to leave their names with or address Dr. L. S. Copper, 433 Pearl street, Cleveland.

Judging from the lively interest manifested there is good ground of hope that regular meetings of the Secular Unionists of the Forest City will now be resumed. While the Franklin Club and the two Progressive Lyceums are in full sympathy with the "Nine Demands of Liberalism" it is believed that a city of more than three hundred thousand people should have at least one live and active organization whose chief object is to agitate for repeal of all laws that give to churchmen any advantage over non-churchmen, as well as to guard against the enactment of more laws that deny the principle of "equal liberty for all and special privileges for none."

Having delayed my return to Chicago, in great measure, in order to attend this memorial meeting, after a few more business calls I boarded the Nickel Plate for the western metropolis, arriving at the Twelfth street station, Chicago, near midnight of the 29th, January, some hours behind time,—trains eastward having been delayed by heavy falls of snow.

And now, notwithstanding the length of these notes I feel that they will not be complete until I again return heartiest thanks to the good friends and co-operators in Cleveland who so kindly entertained and helped me in all possible ways. Though impossible to name all, I must mention the names of Elizabeth H. Russell; Tillie and Thomas Lees; Mary Smith, Newburg Station; Horace E. Carr and family; Mrs. Davies and family; Mr. B. F. Bellows; Mr. L. B. Silver; John Jacobs; Dr. L. S. Copper; Messrs. Claude and J. H. Taylor; Joseph Lee; Mr. and Mrs. Skinner; Mrs. M. McCaslin and Mrs. Bruce. There are many others who deserve kindly and grateful mention but the entire list would occupy more space than can well be spared.

Among the exceptional treats was a ride through the principal streets of the city and through Wade Park, with Mr. Lovern B. Silver, one of whose specialties is fine horses and fine carriages. Mr. Silver is an old friend and comrade of Parker Pillsbury who until prevented by age and infirmity made annual visits to his Cleveland friends.

Another unusual treat was an invitation by the artist, Mr. Ransom, to visit his famous painting now on exhibition at the "Arcade," entitled "Follow Me." It is a representation of "the Christ," entirely different from the ideal usually presented by his followers and worshipers. It is the picture of a giant, seven feet high, muscular and virile in appearance, and without any halo or other hint of the supernatural. A loose gown or toga partially conceals the figure but the design seems to be to show a commanding human form and not in any sense a divine or superhuman object of worship. The expression of countenance is dignified and noble, but full of human sympathy; a calm and peaceful and yet very earnest look—a happy combination of the masculine and the feminine in feature and expression.

That the influence of such paintings in art galleries, and in the homes of the people, have or would have a refining and ennobling effect upon all, I have no doubt, and especially so upon the unborn, if mothers or prospective mothers could have the benefit of frequent contemplation of such ideals, as models.

Father, Mother and Child

BY CAROLINE DE MAUPASSANT.

"Woman is not undeveloped man, but diverse; could we make her as the man, sweet love were slain."—Tennyson.

Will you allow me a little space in your paper to thank Lucinda Chandler for her brave criticism of your "Motherhood in Freedom?" Mrs. Chandler appreciates, as I do, your high and pure aspirations; but she echoes also my convictions when she says that paternity must not be degraded to the "mere function of fertilizing the ovum." The family, father, mother and child, is the only foundation of the true home, and home that of the nation.

Does it follow that marriage, as it is understood and enforced by church and state made laws, is the goal towards which humanity should strive? Is it not rather the danger which it should avoid? Must the so-called physical necessity enslave for ever the mothers of the race? Of course, high minded men, like yourself, Mr. Barry, Mr. Warren and others, enter their protest against the sexual enslavement of women and would fain use all their influence to abolish it. Let them remember then, that women cannot free themselves without their help; that many of them would call them their saviors and would willingly work hand in hand with them if they dared. Why would you hesitate, men, our brothers, to stretch out a helping hand to those who scarcely dare to appeal to you for fear of being misunderstood? Will you not encourage them and strengthen their feeble and desperate efforts? The fate of humanity is in your hands, not in ours; if you value freedom for yourselves give it to your mothers, wives and daughters!

REPLY.

The above letter has been in type more than a month, waiting its turn, or rather waiting for the editorial comment that seemed to be called for. After all, however, there is little need for comment. Those who have read "Motherhood in Freedom" know that I do not "degrade paternity to the mere function of fertilizing the ovum." Far from it. I would have fatherhood to be helpful to motherhood in all ways that free motherhood chooses to accept.

But I do most emphatically protest against the ownership of woman and child by the father, as commonly understood and inculcated by the champions of the "family"—the patriarchate expressed by the formula, "father, mother and child,"—making the father first and head of the family. It is largely because "the nation" is modeled after the patriarchal family that we have so much injustice and oppression in the name of government. If we were not all so thoroughly steeped in the idea that the nation must be a family, with a father at its head, such robbery of the many by the few, as we now have, would not be submitted to for a single year or day. What we want is not the patriarchate nor the matriarchate, but Freedom and Justice—Liberty and personal Responsibility. Rights and privileges must be commensurate with duties and labors. This principle, or rule, puts woman first, or chief factor, in the family and the home. There is far more of endorsement than of criticism in the letter of Mrs. de Maupassant. I think, however, she is in the wrong when she calls upon men to be the saviors of women. Woman must be her own savior, but man can and must be an important, a necessary helper in woman's salvation. In no other way can he achieve his own salvation, or the salvation of the race. M. H.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Since recording the events of the last chapter, weeks of summer sunshine have passed away. Alice, dressed in a soft fleecy white cashmere wrapper, was reclining upon a comfortable lounge in her own cosy room, and which has been drawn closely to the open window from where she can watch the golden rays of the setting sun as it disappears beyond the distant hills. Pale and wan she looks, but the sparkle of returning health is in her eyes as they rest now and then upon the forms of her two little girls who are seated in childish fashion upon the floor, and with their baby fingers trying to wind wreaths of ferns and flowers that were heaped in a low basket that had been placed with its contents at their disposal.

Imelda in one of her soft gray gowns was seated in a low rocker. The book from which she had been reading was lying unnoticed in her lap; her eyes, too, were wandering through the open window to enjoy the golden glory of the setting sun. For a while nothing was heard but childish voices in childish glee. Both fair women were busy with their own thoughts. Imelda had lost some of her wild-rose bloom. The clear-cut features were colorless almost as marble. There was a constrained look upon them yet now and then they would brighten as with an inward light, and reflect the happiness that she, in those moments, felt; but they soon gave way again to that other look, a deep sigh betokening the change of thought.

As the last rays of the sun died out in a golden halo, Alice slowly turned her head and for a while lay watching her friend. 'A penny for your thoughts, my dear," she said with a smile, thus recalling her to present things.

"They are not worth it," Imelda made answer. "They are but vague and unreal dreams." Alice's pale face quivered.

"Vague and unreal," she repeated. "Ah, my precious, as long as they are vague and unreal, you may count yourself happy. It is the real and tangible that makes life a burden. Why have I returned to it? I am sure I would have been many times better off had they laid me beneath the green sods." A pitiful quiver was in the sad young voice, and Imelda felt a sudden pain at her heart as she heard and understood. The next moment she knelt at the side of the invalid.

"Why should you talk like that? See, that is why you should be here," pointing to the little ones. Little Norma was laughing and clapping her chubby hands. She had just succeeded in crowning, with the work of their childish hands, the elder and more stately Meta who was attempting a dignified mien under the high honors. The dark-eyed elf looked so comic that Alice could not repress a smile even though a tear trickled over the pale face. Just then a step in the hallway was heard, and the next moment a figure stood in the open doorway.

"Papa! papa!" Norma's baby voice rang out, and the next instant the little one flew to meet him. He stooped and lifted the flaxen-haired child to his arms. The baby arms were twined about his neck. But little Norma's welcome seemed the only one that was accorded him; even Meta hung back, shy and quiet. She walked backwards to where the fair young mother lay, who clasped the child to her fast beating heart. Imleda rose quickly from her kneeling position and stepping to the open window turned her back to the other inmates of the room. Lawrence Westcot saw and understood. For just one moment his black eyes emitted a flash like a smouldering flame, and his white teeth sank deep into his nether lip. But not one word passed those lips that would have betrayed what was taking place underneath the quiet exterior. He had not seen Imelda since that night three weeks ago, when his words had been like cruel blows to the pure, proud girl. She had managed to keep out of his sight, and he did not possess the courage (?) or daring to force himself into her presence. This lack of courage kept him also from the sick room of his wife, which was probably most fortunate for her chances of recovery. Never once, since her return to consciousness, had her eyes rested upon his face. If she missed him it certainly did not cause regret. It is more likely, however, that she did not think of him at all, in those days.

Certain it was that when he suddenly stood, unannounced, in her presence her heart gave a great bound and then seemed to stand still. Could she have thought that he would never come near her again? But the silence was now becoming oppressive. Not a word from anyone only little Norma's cooing, caressing—"Papa, papa," as the little hands patted the dark inscrutable face. With the little one still in his arms he took several steps forward toward the frightened little woman seated upon the lounge. With a start and a gasp she drew Meta with one arm still closer to her, while the other hand was uplifted in a manner intended to wave him off. Seeing the gesture he instantly stopped. An indescribable look passed over his face. Could it be pain? He hesitated a moment, then kissed the baby face and set little Norma down.

"Papa is not wanted here," he said in a tone that sent a strange thrill to the heart of either woman. Was it the same voice they were wont to hear? No sneer, no sarcasm. How husky it had become! Did it not sound like regret? Ere they could recover from their surprise he was gone and they were once more alone. The excitement that those few minutes had brought had been too much for Alice. The next moment she was sobbing hysterically, and for the next half hour Imelda had her hands full in trying to restore quiet and peace. For seeing the mother weep caused both little girls to fling their playthings aside in true childish fashion and join with their tears. Alice was still very weak, or this episode could scarcely have affected her as it did; and to do Lawrence Westcot justice, he had no intention of inflicting pain when he went to his wife's room that evening.

Nevertheless Imelda felt bitter as she reflected what life must mean to this timid, nervous little woman when the mere sight of the man to whom she was bound could throw her into such an hysterical state. O, how wrong it all was, how wrong! After a while, however, she became more quiet and at Imelda's suggestion she soon retired. Imelda mixed for her a soothing drink and soon had the satisfaction of hearing the even, regular breathing of the sleeper. Long ere this she had sent both little girls away with their nurse, so she had the hours of the summer evening to herself. It was quite warm, the evening shadows were deepening and following an inward prompting she soon found herself in the garden walks, wending her way to the fountain. This was a favorite place with her. Its cooling spray was so pleasant after the oppressive heat of the day. She dipped her hand into the cooling liquid while her thought strayed away to distant friends.

The evening before she had spent in the society of Norman, who had that day received a second letter from Wilbur Wallace. He had expressed himself well pleased with the tenor of those letters as they showed to him the writer as in a mirror of light, and of whose character he was forming a high opinion, even though he could not yet second all the ideas placed before him for inspection. Yet, although he found these ideas impracticable in the extreme, as he expressed it, he could not but pronounce them exalted and pure, beyond that of men in general. Imelda longed to see these two men friends, and the prospects were that her wish would be gratified.

Another thing that had proved of interest to Norman was that Harrisburg had been the early home of Wilbur Wallace, the discovery of which fact was as much a surprise to Imelda as to Norman, as he had never made mention thereof. He gave as a reason for not having done so that the place held little of that which was pleasant to his recollection. It was beneath the waves of the Susquehanna that his mother had found her watery grave, and if it were not that his sisters still lived there he would have been glad to forget that there was such a place. But, he had gone on to say, in his last letter to Imelda,

"Since you, my precious friend, have made your home in Harrisburg, I have often desired to tell you that my idolized Edith, who is the eldest, and the equally precious younger sister, my sweet Hilda, are living somewhere at no great distance from your present home. So many years have passed since I have seen them that they have grown almost strangers to me. Do you think you could take an interest in them sufficient to visit them in my name? Both dear girls often send me long and affectionate letters, wherein they tell their 'stranger' brother all about their girlish affairs, and if there is any saving virtue in thoughts transferred to paper I may hope to keep those blessed souls pure and unstained through the strength of the love that they bear me."

"Could she be sufficiently interested in them?" Imelda smiled as her heart warmed to those unknown girls. She would love them as sisters of her own. Had she known she would long since have hastened to meet them; now she must wait a little while longer until Alice would be stronger, so that she could either leave her or persuade her to come with her. She thought of them this evening as she playfully let the water run through her fingers. In her mind she pictured the meeting with them and then she thought of the report she should send Wilbur, and then her thoughts strayed away to her own wayward sister, of whom she had never again heard so much as one single word, or received one sign of life. She did not know if she was still among the living.

Imelda's heart grew warm and yet sad. What had become of Cora? To what depths had she sunk? or had there been enough latent good hidden somewhere in her character to once more extricate herself and rise to higher ground? "Cora, O Cora! where are you tonight? Don't you know your sister loves you?" and as if in answer to the prayerfully spoken words a voice at her side low and intense spoke her name. "Imelda!" As though the voice had struck her speechless, she stood with stiffening white lips unable to move or speak until her name was repeated.

"Imelda!" Then——

"Frank!" broke from them in a husky whisper.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Peter Manderfield, Grand Forks, N. D.:—Put me down for two copies of "Hilda's Home," bound in cloth. You can have the money whenever you need it. It is seldom I read fiction, but "Hilda's Home" is grand.

Find twenty-five cents to pay for Lucifer. Date my subscription back to first of December. I have been reading the paper of neighbor B——, who cares nothing for it, and I want to pay for what I have received. Will send more money soon. The more I read Lucifer the better I like it.

J. M. Clark, Henryville, Tenn.:—I have been intending to write you ever since the collapse of "Defender." I caught "blizzard" because I dared to insert in its columns the article "To Caress or not to Caress," from Lucifer. I would like to canvass, write and lecture in advocacy of "first birth" [right conditions for first birth?] which if pure and good would, I think, be a better certificate or guaranty for good behavior and for happiness in both worlds than the "second birth" of the measly, mumpy revivalists with their annual epidemics, infecting so many communities of the more illiterate, who swallow the Bible at a gulp, accompanied by groans and doxies and bellowing prayers.

Wm. Humble, Weir City, Kan.:—I enclose fifty cents for Lucifer. I have not been paid any money from the company since August, until this month. We were paid fifty cents on the dollar. I think the best I can do is to ask you to stop the paper. I have nothing but my labor, and if not paid for that I cannot pay you. I am a pit-boss [coal mine], and the company has its "pluck me" stores where I can get provisions for my family, and when pay-day comes there is nothing left for us; hence, I ask you to erase my name from your books.

[The above is a fair sample of many letters received at this office. Lucifer's readers are mainly hard working people, and when they are out of employment, or when employers neglect or refuse to pay the money earned, then however much they may regret the loss of their paper they are obliged to ask the publisher to stop sending it.]

A. C. Knapp, Kingston, Ont., Canada:—What humanity has lost by the death of Miss May Collins can never be estimated. She was for freedom in sexological as well as in theological affairs, and one with her ability and determination would have been of great assistance in your good work. The following extract from a letter written by our lamented friend may be of interest as showing her views relative to Lucifer and its specialty:

"Personally I do not believe in a system of legalized prostitution that ties two people together, no matter how irritating the bonds, although I do believe that mutual sex association on a higher plane between the one man and the one woman is the highest expression of love imaginable."

Respecting the manner of such association she says in speaking of Diana: "It seems to me that it would be the happiest, healthiest mode of living, and that sex association would be far more satisfactory and productive of good." But alas! her dreams of love and liberty were short-lived, and we are called to mourn for friends and freedom.

Enclosed is one dollar for Lucifer for the current year. Have not much time to read your worthy paper but we should assist as much as possible the cause of freedom and there is no better way than by spreading Lucifer's liberal thoughts abroad. I like the neat, compact form of the paper as published now much better than that of old, and am glad to see this evidence of progress.

"Aunt Lydia:"—Let me not be "too late" with greetings for this new year to all of your readers—and especially to the members of "L. U."—which signifies a "Liberal Union" for Lucifer, our Light-Bearer; the organ of our particular and special manifestations, and bearer of light and knowledge upon the same. And with "greetings," we want to bear in mind the "liberal" part, and be prompt with annual dues.

The "union" part is as nearly perfect as can be; we have no need to even speak of that except for congratulations to each and everyone.

Perhaps it will not be any inducement to the members of Lucifer Union, and to those who would like to become members—to say that when they write me—(those who have not lately;) that I have a photograph—"New Year's gift" for them—but it may be to some.

And now, dear Lucifer, though changed in form, you are the same old friend. Someone said "To grow old is to grow safe and privileged, and sure." Five years ago the man who "borned" the Light-Bearer talked to me of this very "form." (Query: If Mr. Harman is the "father" of Lucifer, who is its mother?) As soon as I saw this form, I thought of his old illustration of size for paper, by folding the old Lucifer one half and having columns run the other way. Must say I am extremely well pleased with the new dress—it seems an improvement. Although I have preserved every paper for fifteen years (of Mr. Harman's publication) these will be easier preserved, by binding. And, with the same old heading, it does not "lose its identification." Through it, I mentally behold the lovely oil painting of the same in the editorial office of Lucifer's scribe. Also long association has endeared it to us. Best wishes for Lucifer.

Flora Fox, Rochester, Minn.:—Have just read "The Old and the New Ideal." It contains "heaps" of truth and tons of common sense. Demands one code of rules for both sexes, and those rules founded upon practical experience.

Am glad the author has put the price within the reach of nearly all. The idea that a book is not valuable, in interest or education unless it has a high price attached, and that a cheap book for the masses renders the works of other reforms less valuable, belongs to the "old ideals" and false superstitions of the past.

And right here this same logic might well apply to a query of the author, on page 77. "And finally is it not human nature to value that but little which we can have for the simple asking, and to value even less what is forced upon us?" In the first place we should get out of the "force" plane and move into the realm of plain reason. To value but little that which we can so easily obtain, shows that we have not put the true price upon it; have not considered the worth of it so much as the mere possession, hence we must learn to discriminate between values for ourself only, as we can not choose for another.

I like what the author says of freedom. "I will not show you what you have a right to do, but what you should do in order to lead a happier and nobler life. . . . When I speak of freedom . . . I mean not only immunity from all legal interference, but what I would call far more important, emancipation from superstition and the resulting customs and false (love) ideals."

The aim of this book seems to be to make one think. It will not allow you to love the "old ideals" just because they are old! It stirs up all lazy brain vibrations, and brings the glimpse of the possible millennium, in a very practical progressive growth. Who of us are ready to grow out of our false love ideals?

THE UNREVEALED RELIGION.

An address of great depth, strength, and beauty. By the veteran, J. K. Ingalls.

"The rainbow is not less beautiful and wonderful to me than to Noah, or to the aborigines, because I understand something of optics and the refraction of light. The rose is not less attractive because botany has taught us to analyze and classify it. The Good of Truth, whether we worship it as an entity or as a personality, or conceive of it as impersonal, is an ever-living and persistent principle man can never cease to revere and admire. And his growth in knowledge and progress in all things refining and elevating to his nature will be promoted, not retarded, by the true but unrevealed, and as yet "unloved religion, 'The Religion of Progress'."

LOVE, MARRIAGE, AND DIVORCE

And the Sovereignty of the Individual.

A Discussion between Henry James, Horace Greely, and Stephen Pearl Andrews. There are here included the final replies of Mr. Andrews, refused by the New York Tribune, and a subsequent discussion, occurring twenty years later, between Mr. James and Mr. Andrews.

"The great lesson for the world to learn is that HUMAN BEINGS DO NOT NEED TO BE TAKEN CARE OF. What they do need is such conditions of justice and freedom and friendly co operation that they can take care of themselves. Provided for by another, and subject to his will as the return tribute, they pine, and sicken, and die. This is true equally of women as of men; as true of wives as it is of vassals or serfs. Our whole existing marital system is the house of bondage and the slaughter-house of the female sex. Whether its evils are inherent or incidental, whether they belong to the essence or the administration of the institution, whether they are remediable without or only by means of revolution, are the questions that now have to be discussed."

Popular Follies and Crimes.

BY JAMES S. DENSON.

Dwight L. Moody says that Paul's declaration that "Unto the pure all things are pure" does not apply in the discussion of the nude in art, because "Paul is speaking about a different thing altogether from that which now concerns us, and is laying down laws about the clean and unclean with respect to meats and drinks among the Jews." In other words, Mr. Moody, Paul was speaking of the senseless taboos of superstition, and that is just what you are talking about when you echo the ascetic denunciations of the nude. "Paul says that all these distinctions ceased in Christianity, and that all kinds of food might be considered as lawful and proper." Exactly, Sir; and all these distinctions which make one part of the human body pure and another impure ceased in rationalism, and now all parts of the body are equally "lawful and proper."

The Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York has for its director General di Cesnola, its curator, Dr. William H. Arnold, and its gatekeeper, D. W. Kellogg. All these gentlemen declare that no man in overalls can be admitted to view the art treasures in the museum. For seventeen years no man so branded with the badge of shame has been permitted within the sacred portals, asseverates General di Cesnola. "We would just as soon think of admitting a drunken man, or a man without a coat, or for that matter a man without his trousers." The fine discrimination of the Museum officials is shown in their lumping men in overalls and shirt-sleeves with drunken men. A workman in overalls is good enough to chisel the rough marble into a thing of beauty but he is not good enough to go into the Museum to see it after it has passed out of his care. "A poor woman with a shawl over her head" is barred, say the snobs in charge of the Museum of Art. "Suppose she were rich, with nothing on her head, or the shawl were from India?" asks the "Journal." Gatekeeper Kellogg's rules let in people who are "properly dressed," and of course Gatekeeper Kellogg can tell at a glance who are "properly dressed." He is infallible. (By the way, does the Metropolitan Museum of Art belong to all the people or only to Gatekeeper Kellogg's "properly dressed" folk?) A man without trousers is shut out, necessarily, but is a fashionable woman with only shoulder-straps for the upper part of her gown? Is it possible to have common sense exhibited in the management of public institutions?

"A naked, tipsy woman dancing in her shame," is the description given of Macmonnies' Bacchante by the "Literary World." Who is simple enough to believe that this was the artist's thought? How could a "tipsy woman" balance upon one foot in the attitude given the Bacchante, holding in one hand above her head a cluster of grapes and bearing on her other arm a heavy child? "Dancing in her shame" undoubtedly has reference to her nudity, and the expression will not prejudice against the statue any man or woman who can look on his or her own body without blushing. Moody, the evangelist, thus raves over the Bacchante:

Think of it! An intoxicated female, totally unclothed, standing on one foot, her head thrown back, a bunch of grapes in one hand and a new-born infant in the other! Consider the history of this courtesan; consider the character of the living model who posed for the statue; consider its position in a public place where the youth of both sexes are, in a certain sense, obliged to go to obtain books for reading and reference, and what shall we say? Do we parents want to encourage this thing by the examples in our own homes?

This is a beautiful example of "clerical mind"! What does Mr. Moody know of the "history of this courtesan"? How does he know that she is a courtesan? What does he know of the "character of the living model"? Who is his authority for the insinuation that she is aught but a virtuous woman, even from the point of view of his own narrow sect? Does he mean to have us understand that the mere fact of posing nude is sufficient to damn a woman, in his eyes? If he does—and he seems to—then all that can be said is that artists' models will do well to continue strangers to Mr. Moody.

Some weeks since, Captain Chapman of the New York police raided a dinner party at Sherry's, a very high-toned restaurant. It was done because the virtuous captain had information which led him to suppose that "Egypt" and other dancing women would give an "improper" exhibition for the delectation of the wealthy gentlemen who were partaking of the dinner. This raid has been the most talked-about event in Gothamite circles since its occurrence. Some of the gentlemen concerned preferred a complaint against Captain Chapman, and a long and "spicy" trial before one of the police commissioners followed. The newspapers were full of the nerve-tingling details. The austere "Sun," which hates the "new journalism," gave the fullest report, printing evidence that the "sensational" papers were too modest to admit to their columns, which makes us suspect that Dana is opposed to sensationalism only when it costs enterprise and money. As a matter of course, the raid has done more to make "lubricity" familiar to the people of the city and of the country at large than would ten thousand undisturbed Seeley dinners. The compulsory moralists always make a mess of their business. But through it all grows the power of the state. Now the grand jury has indicted Mr. Seeley and the other principals in the affair, the police of Brooklyn have followed the example of the official meddlers of New York, the other day raiding a dinner party, and the Metropolitan Board of Police Commissioners hav unanimously exonerated Captain Chapman. "Among policemen and others directly interested, the decision caused great interest. They regard the action of the commissioners as establishing a precedent by which police captains might assume much additional power. Under the decision of the commissioners, it was argued, a policeman could invade any place where he might suspect an offense against some one of the numerous laws of the city or state was being committed. The decision, it was claimed, would support the policemen in acting without warrants, and trusting solely to their own impulse or discretion." The commissioners, however, deny that any such precedent has been established. But their denial avails nothing. These gentlemen know more and consequently are more cautious than the ignorant subalterns of the force; or they may even be credited with sincerity in their disclaimer, and yet the denial be valueless. We know how the great mass of invasive statutes and procedure has accumulated; the process is a comparatively slow one but it is as sure as the remorseless march of time. Every new wrong to which the people submit weakens their resisting power, and toward the end they grow too slavish to even protest. Tyranny in its confidence becomes careless, and then —

In his New York "Sunday Journal" article, Dwight L. Moody quotes from the decision of Judge Phillips in the Harman case as follows:

"There is in the popular conception and heart such a thing as modesty. It was born in the Garden of Eden. After Adam and Eve ate of the fruit of the tree of knowledge they passed from that condition of perfectibility, which some people nowadays aspire to, and, their eyes being opened, they discerned that there was both good and evil; 'and they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons.' From that day to this civilized man has carried with him the sense of shame, the feeling that there were some things on which the eye, the mind, should not look; and where men and women become so depraved by the use, or so insensate from perverted education, that they will not veil their eyes, nor hold their tongues, the government should perform the office for them in protection of the social compact and the body politic." [U. S. vs Harman, 45 F. R., 423.]

One wonders what the thoughtful student of history, who in the twenty-fifth century may pore over the records of the nineteenth, will do with Judge Phillips. How will he classify this judge who, presumptively set for the defense of the citizen, prostitutes his position to the service of the exploded superstitions of the childhood of civilization? How will the future antiquarian label this judge who gravely argues for the censorship of art and literature on the ground that the eye and mind of man should not take cognizance of the fact that men and women are of different sexes? Much nonsense is uttered from the bench—we do not expect a great deal of profound wisdom from that quarter, but assuredly we should be spared the infliction of deliverances that rank intellectually with the homilies of a plantation exhorter. If our judges cannot keep clear of superstitions of the order of salt-spilling omens and left-hind-foot-of-rabbit charms we had better put in their places Sioux medicine men or African witch doctors. If we are to have primeval intellects in judicial high places let us be perfectly frank about it; let us honestly say that we are going to savagedom for our judges. In his attempt to prove that the government has the right to compel us to veil our eyes and hold our tongues, when he thinks we should, Judge Phillips appeals for sanction to the Garden of Eden myth, the Tree of Knowledge legend, the fig-leaf folk story, whichever you choose to call it, that simple guess of early man as to the origin of evil in the world. Judge Phillips seems not to know that the whole yarn was long ago discredited, that the ablest intellects in the Christian church hold it as no more than a childish fable. Why don't he try to frighten us with the tales of Gulliver or the story of Jack and the Beanstalk? Finally, to reinforce these formidable foes of common sense, our antediluvian judge lugs in two more myths, "the social compact" and "the body politic." Who have entered into this "social compact"? If it be true that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," what becomes of the "social compact" for those who refuse to be governed in a way repugnant to them? When, for example, did Moses Harman agree to a compact binding him to veil his eyes and hold his tongue at such times as Judge Phillips should think it proper for him to do so?

A Defense of Divorce.

George Wilson, in Kansas City "Journal."

Judge Henry, a fine specimen, and a well preserved one, of the old tyrant Bourbon Democracy, in his speech in the First Congregational church of Kansas City, said that the ease with which married people get divorces under the laws of this state is "infamous." For my part I cannot think of many things that are more infamous than for a man to compel a woman to have the relation of wife to him against her will. It is a curious case of the power of superstition over man that if there has been no marriage ceremony a mob will hang the man for so doing, but if there has been, the same act on his part is approved.

He delivered a panegyric on South Carolina, saying that she is the one state in the Union where no divorce has ever been granted. Why did he not add what he could learn from the Encyclopedia Britannica, if he does not know it—that she is the only state in the world whose laws provide how much of a man's estate his mistress shall get. Every state that has a law forbidding divorce needs an annex law of that kind, whether it has it or not.

The judge says that the divorce laws of this state conflict with the Divine law and are nurseries of infidelity and crime. Look at France in the long time that no divorce was allowed; and at England, where it is very hard to get a divorce. Is there any more infidelity here than there? If the literature of those countries and popular belief are any guide, it is the rule for every married man to keep a mistress.

The rule of the Mosaic law, repeated in the New Testament, and which is impregnable, according to Judge Henry, was that a man could put away his wife for adultery. But what about the woman, if her husband were similarly guilty and she innocent? Under the rule of the Jews, which Judge Henry thinks "divine," the woman had nothing to say and her husband did as he pleased with her and with other women. Judge Henry is immensely enamored of that jug handle arrangement. Ho-ho! But then we men are so weak.

DIVORCES BY COLLUSION.

He is especially aggrieved that married people get divorces by collusion. Now, if neither one wants to live with the other, I can see no more natural and proper thing for them to do than separate. And I cannot see, for the world, how I have any right to force them to live together if they don't want to, nor how Judge Henry has, nor where all the rest of the people in the state have a right to force these two to live together. And the experience of France and England shows that it does not succeed. If they want a divorce by collusion they will commit adultery by collusion if refused a divorce. And the latter sort of agreement is, I am credibly informed, a very common proceeding in Europe, where divorces cannot be had. How much improvement is that on divorce by collusion?

One of the brightest women in the medical profession in America said to me: "I did not think I was doing right to bring a drunkard's children into the world, so I got a divorce and studied medicine to support myself and our one child." I know many another weaker woman who has gone on under the ideas that Judge Henry holds and brought a lot of children of an habitually drunken father into the world, who can scarcely be anything but a misfortune to themselves and to others.

I know a case of a young couple that, after they had a child, got a divorce by collusion, on account of the husband's drunkenness, and each married again. She took the child and another man married and loved her, and there is nothing that his large means can get for her and the child that he does not get if they want it. Both are as happy as people can be. The drunken father reformed and married another woman and has been a sober and happy man ever since. Instead of three miserable people, there are now five happy ones.

THE INCREASE OF DIVORCE.

Does it never occur to Judge Henry why there are more divorces now than formerly? One cause is the changed economic conditions. A Chicago judge says that most of them grow out of "the bread and butter question." Another is that American women are learning to make their own living and so will not stand from their husbands what they formerly had to, because completely dependent. It is not right, it is not salutary for the race that when people have made a mistake they be not allowed a chance to correct it. No one has a right to compel a man and woman to live in unhappiness when they can find happiness. Judge Henry's logic would require a child that has wandered into a jail to spend the rest of its life in it.

Judge Henry is a sample of the Bourbon Democrats, the ruling spirit in the politics of this state, calling themselves Jeffersonian yet as far from the spirit of Jefferson as the East is from the West. Jefferson was the embodiment of the spirit of liberty. He said, give truth and error a fair field and no favor, and truth would win. These Bourbons continually forget that the makers of the state are greater than the state. The judge represents himself and somebody else who would fix a "sphere" for women and one for men, and keep each one in his and her own sphere. Wouldn't it smack a little of appropriateness in disciples of Jefferson and freedom to consult the women about fixing their sphere? Where does man get a right to fix her sphere and she have no right to fix his?

MANHOOD OF MEN IS DECAYING.

In my opinion, this alarm over the fact that woman is becoming too self-assertive, too "new," too "masculine" means only one thing. It means that the manhood of the men is decaying. I believe that vice-drugs and vices are retarding the growth of the intellect of men, and that the women are actually gaining the advantage, progressing mentally out of proportion to the men. And the men who feel it want a curb put on the women. Let the men abandon their vice-drugs and vices.

Who has not seen a woman trying through years to get her husband to be man enough to keep sober? Who has not seen women taking their husbands out of saloons—the "weaker vessel" taking care of the stronger?

Judge Henry is better informed on what God wants done in this matter than I am. But I call his attention to Jean d'Arc, Isabella, Katherine of Russia, Elizabeth and Victoria as some of the "weaker vessels" who dodged Almighty fiat and did great works for the world.

Among our fathers in Northern Europe, as described by Tacitus, the state of morals was vastly better than among us. Yet it was only necessary for a woman to get witnesses and declare in three specific places that she was divorced and it was complete. It is not the divorcing that is the social ulcer; it is the conditions that make people unhappy in married life. Seek these out; remove their causes. While they exist, refusal of divorce is only like putting a piece of court plaster over a boil on a man's body; it may drive in what might better come out.

People having made a choice ought to be made to stick to it; "unless they have such grounds as wise legislation may prescribe." "Wise legislation"—heaven save the mark! Look in on the average lot "of simlin heads" making laws. Look at the "acts to repeal an act." If they are wise enough to cure the evil, why are they not wise enough to have prevented it? Or, rather, why were they not wise enough not to have caused it? Legislation has brought about the economic conditions that cause most of the divorces.

JUDGE HENRY ARRAIGNED.

"I would not compel her to live with and treat such a man as her husband, but would separate them, giving time for repentance and reform." And where does "I" get the right to manage a private affair between the man and wife? Suppose they turn the tables and take hold of "I" and do what they please with him and his relations with his wife?

Judge Henry speaks of "one species of immorality that was rare fifty years ago." But it was not. The only difference was that in this very state fifty years ago it was committed by husbands with slave women, and if Judge Henry does not know this, I do not know where he kept his eyes and ears in those days.

He says: "Since the Savior appeared on earth, in every land which Christianity has reached and obtained a footing the marriage relation has been held sacred and recognized by the law as such. While marriage originates in an agreement between the parties, which until executed is of no higher obligation than any other civil contract, yet, when the minister of the Gospel or other person authorized to perform the ceremony with their consent completes the engagement between the parties who have agreed upon a marriage it ceases to be a mere civil contract, which may be annulled at the pleasure of the parties, and becomes a solemn engagement, to be terminated only in the manner prescribed by the sovereign power of the state. . . . And it would be well if the lawmakers would heed the law of God," etc. If that is not a case of "reversion to an ancient type," the type of union between church and state, I cannot see very well. The people of this country have wisely concluded to stick to human law, for the excellent reason that it is impossible for them to agree as to what is "the law of God."

I venture the assertion that neither Judge Henry nor any other Democratic judge in this state can truly define "law." Voltaire says to disputants, "define your terms." Judge Henry has not the remotest idea of the origin and meaning of the word "God."

It is said that man grows old by the deposit of chalky substance in his tissues, and, whereas, they are "springy" in youth, they get less and less flexible in age. A state has its youth and grows old and becomes like a stiff old horse with chalk in his tissues. The enactment of "laws" that limit the natural rights of the individual are to the state what the chalk in the tissues of physical man is. They make it less and less possible for the individual to move, and thus old age comes over the state. What we need is proper economic conditions, natural freedom, and then everyone for himself and herself must at last "walk up to the captain's office and settle," and the captain is "the law of the survival of the fittest."

NATURE THE PROPER RULER.

People who have sense enough to marry wisely and live together pleasantly will, other things being equal, leave more children of like natures than those who do not marry wisely and who lose much time in divorcing and remarrying. And it is much better to leave them with that natural advantage and that natural penalty. The best of life that I have ever seen was in an unorganized territory, where there was no law or courts. Everybody minded his own business; there was no interference with anyone's private affairs, and no taxes to pay for services that we did not need or want.

In his "History of American Banking," Gouge, in 1835, foretold the social decay and misfortunes that would be brought on this country, just as they have come, and added: "Instead of tracing its cause to some positive institution, the removal of which, while it might not immediately relieve, . . . would prevent . . . recurrence, men set themselves to heaping law upon law and institution upon institution. They in this resemble quacks, who apply lotions to the skin to cure diseases of the blood or digestive organs occasioned by intemperate living. These projects of relief and efforts at corrective legislation will be numberless in multitude and diversified in character; but as they will not proceed on the principle of 'removing the cause that the effect may cease,' they will ultimately increase the evils they are intended to cure."

Certainly there are few states in our Union where there has been more close, searching and tyrannical legislation, infringing on the natural rights of the individual, than by the Bourbon Democracy of this state—what we might call, in their own language, a lot of "projickin' simlin-heads." And the breath was not out of their mouth for cursing the tyranny of the Drake constitution before they began it.

Banker vs Judge

A large share of space in this week's issue is given up to a stinging reply to a Missouri judge by a Missouri banker. A leading western paper, the Kansas City "Journal," Republican in politics, in a late issue gives prominence to the divorce question, calling it a "burning issue just at this time," and that "the legislature is being called upon to make and amend laws on the subject." Elsewhere in the same issue—Jan. 17,—it is said that "Senator Young's divorce bill provides that the prosecuting attorney of the county shall cross examine the plantiff's witnesses and shall in every way assist the court in determining whether a divorce should be granted.

"The bill allows each county attorney an extra assistant at one hundred dollars per month," and adds, "if this bill should become a law, and there is every reason to believe that it will, it will largely do away with men and women coming to Missouri and bringing suit for divorce without the defendant ever knowing that there is trouble in the family."

Thus it would appear that the already enormously overburdened tax payers of Missouri will be compelled to pay to some briefless young lawyer in each county a salary at least three times as great as he could earn at productive labor, simply to assist the county attorney in preventing people who would escape from marriage slavery, from obtaining freedom.

Is there no parallel between such legislation and the fugitive slave laws of fifty years ago?

Though the reply of George Wilson,—who is said to be "President of the Lafayette County bank, (Lexington, Mo.) and a leading citizen of Western Missouri,"—is a long one, it is hoped that no reader will fail to read it. The natural right of women and men to manage their own conjugal affairs without supervision by outsiders was scarcely ever better defended; surely not by one of the privileged classes.

The sub-heads in the article are those of the "Journal," not ours.

Involuntary Servitude.

Among the very few influential dailies of this country whose editors have the manliness to protest against the encroachments upon individual liberty by our irresponsible and monarchical supreme court the "Cleveland Recorder" holds an honorable position. In its issue of Jan. 29 the "Recorder" has this to say:

"If the report from Washington is true, that the Supreme Court holds that in spite of the constitutional amendment against involuntary servitude, a contract to labor may be enforced against the laborer by bodily seizure and imprisonment, we may well wonder whether that amendment did indeed abolish slavery. As the decision in question was given in a sailor case, it may call for an amendment of our ancient maritime laws, rather than for renewed criticism of the enslaving tendencies of the Supreme Court. In either event, however, it calls for action of some kind. When a ship's crew, at this period of our country's history, may for striking work while on shore, be arrested, put in irons and carried to the ship for which they have refused to work, it is time for congress to overhaul either its own laws or the judge-made laws of the Supreme Court. The fact that Judge Harlan dissents from this decision of the court, indicates that once more that body has attempted to drive a nail into the coffin of individual liberty."

The Curse of Legalism.

"Sociologic Lessons," by Henry M. Parkhurst, are suggestive and instructive, though not always in line with Lucifer's central thought. Number thirty of this series, found in this week's issue, treats of "Legal Tender." This lesson seems to postulate or assume that the citizens of this country and their government are two distinct entities. For if the government is not an entity distinct from and superior to the citizens, where does it get the right to make gold coins, or gold and silver coins, and the notes based on these coins, the only legal tender in the payment of debts? Is it because "the people," in their collective capacity, have given this right to the government? If so, where did the people in their collective capacity get this right? Do collective bodies possess rights that do not inhere in the units? If a particular Jones, Smith or Brown has no right to establish and enforce any particular coin as legal tender, how or where do any number of Joneses, Smiths and Browns get such right? Do citizen rights increase with numbers?

The theory seems to be that until organized under rules called a "government," a "state" or "nation," these Joneses et al, have no right to enforce "legal tender," but that in some mysterious way these paper rules—and the "oath" that is taken when a man begins the business of enforcing these rules—completely change the character of an act from wrong to right, from bad to good,—in a word, from invasion to government!

Remove the curse of legalism; take away the right to invade and rob by authority of paper rules called a government; put gold and silver, copper and nickel, iron, brass, tin, zinc, granite, coal, clay,—and other natural products, wheat, corn, rye apples; also manufactured products, houses, clothes, tools, etc., etc.,—put all these on a basis of equality, of equal freedom; let all commodities compete on equal terms for use as a basis of "currency" in making exchanges of wealth, and we will have removed one of the chief causes of poverty, crime and misery now so prevalent everywhere.

Then natural selection or the survival of the fittest will soon show what commodity is best adapted both as basis of currency and standard of value. If, under free competition, gold should be preferred as such standard, rather than wheat—"the staff of life," or an hour's work at productive labor,—the source of all acquired wealth,—then no one could complain of favoritism or partiality, and but few enormous fortunes could be built up at the expense of productive labor. Monopolies of all sorts would then dwindle and perish for lack of their right arm and right hand—LEGAL TENDER MONEY!

Much of the same reasoning applies to another law-protected monopoly—marriage, which means the exclusive right vested by law in man to own and control the "creatory," the sex-nature of woman. As gold is made the exclusive standard and basis of legal tender money—plus silver in limited quantities, so monogamic marriage—plus a limited quantity of concubinage or plurality, as in South Carolina and among the aristocracies of Europe ("morganatic" unions), is made the only legal tender, or standard and basis of morality or purity in the sex-relation of women and men; and this interference in the realm of sexology and sociology is quite as productive of evil as is the same interference in the realm of economics. Legal tender money, as the basis and chief factor of all economic villainies and inequities, robs men of their natural right to the earth; so likewise, legal tender marriage robs children of their natural right to be born well; and students of sociology and of biology are rapidly coming to the conclusion that the interference of legalism in the matter of populating the earth is quite as disastrous in results, quite as productive of pauperism, crime, vice, imbecility, insanity, etc., as is the interference of legalism in the matter of industrial economics and exchange of products—if not more so.

The right to be born well (if born at all) is the first and most important of all human rights. When this right is denied no adequate compensation, to the injured one, can possibly be made by a fair division of subsequent opportunities. Laws which compel woman to be the mother of unwelcome children, or that deprive her of the right, at all times, to choose the conditions and the co-operators necessary for doing her best work as race-builder, are more criminal than are those which would deny the right of the child to live, after it is born. From a high moral standpoint it may often be a greater wrong to give life than to destroy it.

FREE COMPETITION! NATURAL SELECTION!

Equal opportunities for all and special privileges for none. Then let the fittest survive. If, in freedom, gold is demonstrated to be the best standard of exchangeable values then the gold standard will be generally adopted, and those who prefer another standard can also be suited. If under free competition and comparison of results, the exclusive sex-union of two, a woman and a man, is proved to be the best for individual happiness and for the production and rearing of children then monogamy will certainly survive—and those who prefer other methods of association can also be suited; suited without resorting to falsehood, perjury, cruelty or murder to obtain their desires. As a result, poverty will cease; sexual prostitution—legal and illegal—will also cease. As poverty is the natural complement and necessary outcome of legalism in economic relations so sex-prostitution is the natural complement and necessary outcome of legalism in sex-relations.

In a recent discussion at the rooms of the Society of Anthropology, in Chicago, the question was raised, "what to do with our defectives?" One speaker said if it were not for our unwise "charities" nature would soon wipe these defectives off the earth. Another speaker said if it were not for the unwise meddling of human law and custom nature would not have made these defectives, and hence there would have been no need of the wiping-off process, and no occasion for the so-called public and private charities to take care of defectives.

A fitting close for this article is in the words of Banker Wilson, printed elsewhere in this issue. Speaking of marriage and divorce he says:

"The best of life I have ever seen was in an unorganized territory, where there was no law or courts. Everybody minded his own business; there was no interference with anyone's private affairs, and no taxes to pay for services that we did not need or want."

This is equivalent to saying that Liberty with Responsibility for one's acts—the right to make mistakes and the right to learn from or profit by those mistakes, is all the law that is needed to make the human race as happy as the present imperfect development of natural conditions will allow.

The Other Side.

BY R. B. KERR.

[A few years ago, when Grant Allen published "The Woman Who Did," and "British Barbarians," a well known High Church London clergyman, the Rev. Theodore Stebbing, of Mile End Church, was advertised to preach in confutation of that author's theories. Lucifer sent a special correspondent, who reports the sermon as follows.]

Dearly beloved brethren. We are met today to discuss the doctrines of that notorious heretic who is known among the sons of Darkness as the Darwinian St. Paul.

It may be interesting to begin with an account of the personality of the man. In appearance he bears considerable resemblance both to Charles Darwin and to Alfred Russel Wallace, two of the most mischievous representatives of an unbelieving generation.

I also understand, dear brothers and sisters, that this man shares with these wicked men whom I have named the fame of a noble and stainless character. This is one of the inscrutable dispensations of Providence, who so often makes the faithful a bye-word for meanness, spite and uncharitableness, while he allows the Prince of Darkness to endow unbelieving men with every virtue, in order to make them a snare to believers.

And what, my friends, are the doctrines which this man is spreading like poison? They may be briefly summed up in this; that he is trying to make all the people in the world happy, when God has decreed that the great majority shall be miserable.

I wish today to deal particularly with his theories regarding sex; a subject of which I believe that many of you, my dear sisters, have never heard, and to which I shall try to allude with the utmost delicacy.

How logical this writer is, and how perfectly qualified his theories are to give happiness to the whole human race, you will see at once when I state his views.

In a word, my brothers and sisters, he wishes to introduce absolute individual liberty into sex relations.

The first result of such liberty would be to leave women free to refuse to bear children when not inclined to have them. This is a direct attack upon the teaching of Holy Writ, which prescribes the unlimited bearing of children as the penalty which women have to pay for their wicked participation with Eve in the sin of plucking the apple.

Not only would the pernicious theories of our author immensely increase the happiness of women by relieving them in many cases from bearing an unlimited number of children to a man they hate, but in another way it would add to the happiness of the race. It would diminish the number of children who are brought into a miserable life of poverty, sickness and hopelessness, in accordance with the will of Our Most Holy Lord, who has predestined the majority to everlasting misery.

It is not enough for our author to wish to alleviate the sufferings of married women and their children, but he aspires, forsooth, to add to the pleasures of unmarried women. We rejoice that one of the triumphs of God's working in the world is the evolution in modern times of our dear sister, the virgin spinster. How beautiful to view the development of her life, and to see the gradual fading of the eye and the dying out of all earthly passion! How good that so many of our dear sisters should be left free to sing a hymn of perpetual praise to the beneficence of the Creator, instead of being troubled with the cares of the world, and the lusts of the flesh!

In order, my dear sisters, that you may know how many of you are chosen for this blessed lot, I will quote the statistics of one city, the city of Edinburgh, at last census. Edinburgh had 142,000 women and 119,000 men. From this it is clear that at least 23,000 women in Edinburgh can never be married. But the number of male births exceeds the number of female births, and therefore it is probable that among the young there is a majority of males, the feminine surplus being made up among the adults alone. Morover, many men will not marry, and many emigrate, leaving their women behind. It is therefore very safe to assume that the number of celibate women is double what the census indicates, and is really something like 46,000 out of 142,000. Think of that, my dear sisters, think that thirty-two out of every hundred of you will be freed from the desires of the flesh, and be able to lead a spiritual life. Morover, if we reckon the proportion of the remaining 68 per cent. who will make unhappy marriages, or be crushed by unwilling motherhood, you will see what glorious opportunities you will have of becoming perfect through suffering.

My friends, what does this false guide propose to do for our dear sister, the virgin spinster? He proposes to turn away her mind from the things of God, and to fix it on the pleasures of this world. He wishes to free her from the contempt and loneliness which are so often her lot, and to introduce her to all the intellectual, emotional, magnetic and physical pleasures of unrestricted intercourse with such men as she may happen to love and esteem. He does not wish her to suffer any more from those nervous troubles which draw her so near to her Maker. He believes that the early fading of feminine charms is unnatural, and due to listlessness and loss of hope, or to undesired motherhood; and he wishes to see the eye of the woman of forty sparkle as brightly as that of the woman of twenty, and practice till far on in life the wicked witchery which is associated with sex.

Once more my brothers and sisters, this man wishes to relieve the dullness, the hatred, and the despair which so often characterize domestic life, by allowing perfectly free association between persons of opposite sex according to their inclinations. Some will say that the majority do not care for freedom and variety, because their thoughts are bound up in one object. But, my brothers and sisters, how contrary that would be to all our experience of life! However much we love our native heath, do we not all enjoy new scenes? Although the climate in which we live may suit us better than any other, yet our physician prescribes change of air from time to time. Is not variety of occupation stimulating to the mind and the body? Do we not all love change of diet? Does any man refuse to eat cherries because he has already pledged his affections to strawberries and cream? And is it to be supposed that there is one department of life where the rules which govern all the rest do not prevail?

My friends, it is only too true that variety of sexual pleasures is delightful to the souls of men and women. It is natural to most of us to love one man or woman more than others; but only the veriest Philistine can live in a world full of these soft, charming creatures we call women, and be dead to the fascination of all but one of them. To associate with a new type of mind, to exchange new ideas, to admire in a new form those beauties and graces with which the Prince of Darkness has cunningly endowed nearly all human beings who lead a natural life, to feel the magnetic influence of a new nature, surely, my friends, these things are delightful to all men and women who are not self-deceived.

Dear brothers and sisters, it is necessary that I should leave this subject, for I confess that my natural and impure heart leaps with delight at the very thought of the pleasures which I have described.

My friends, be not deceived. If the theories of this nefarious author are realized, this vale of tears which we call the world will be changed into an Earthly Paradise, another Garden of Eden. In such a state of existence, who would stop to reflect on the joys of the Paradise above, and the goodness of his Maker? Turn ye, turn ye, my friends, from the teachings of the Evil One, lest haply ye be consumed, and perish in the flame.

Temperamental Harmony.

BY JESSE H. JONES.

One of the very difficult things to do in this world is to convey into the human mind a new thought. All of us in the field of reform, whatever phase of reform we advocate, experience the same difficulty. Hence I say to the readers of Lucifer, kindly turn as favorable a mind as you can toward what I say, for I am undertaking this very difficult task.

Whatever our power of will may be there are some things beyond that power. For instance, a man and a woman may marry, but it is not within the power of man to make some marriages happy. There are discords in human nature which no human striving or suffering can turn into concord. It is better to avoid these discords than to bear them, or to break asunder the marriage relation out of which they arise.

There are some desolations that no medicament can cure. One is when all or all but one of the children in a family die, and die because they are of too feeble vitality to live. Another is when children are born and live that never should have been born, the two parents are so unfitted to be parents together, and yet might have been well fitted for other partners. And there is much more, but these will suffice for illustration.

Now the secret of life which is the secret of love has been discovered. Prof. Wm. Byrd Powell made the discovery, and there is no more important knowledge to be communicated to mankind in the domain of our bodily life than this secret. There is a reason, a deep reason in the very substance and structure of the vitality itself, why some men and women separate from all others and love each other for life; and why these persons do not have and could not have any love for some other persons. This deep reason it is of great importance for every body to know. It is precious, sacred knowledge, and whoever has it has what cannot be measured by gold.

This knowledge is not the only knowledge worth having. It is not to take the place of other knowledge, but in its own place it is invaluable. If there are any who think that I imagine that the possession and practice of this knowledge would cure all the evils of human life, then I have failed to express myself adequately. But that the possession and practice of such knowledge would do a good which nothing else can take the place of, this is to me a verified fact.

Let me try to indicate the place of this knowledge in the sphere of life. There are relations in life, and there are actions under those relations. Thus it is the common form of speech to say "the marriage relation." Then there are right conduct and wrong conduct under that relation. Now Lucifer is, I think, dealing chiefly with conduct, and is teaching what it deems right conduct in the marriage relation. But the basis on which to establish that relation wisely and well, so that the two parties in it shall be happy together and shall fulfil the marriage function well, is a matter of far more importance than right conduct in that relation; yet it is not taught, and its value is not realized. The matter is thought of as the queer, curious notion of some quirky people, when it is fundamental to all improvement of mankind in the world. The bringing together of the right man and the right woman in each marriage, is of the highest importance, and the making familiar throughout the community the principles and laws upon which the right selection is made is of priceless value. But if any body supposes that the plan of action I would have adopted would be to establish a method that would pair off people under the charge of some supervisor of marriage, so that they would be sorted out and set together as a phrenologist might read them off, then allow me to say, I have no such idea at all. On the contrary what I desire to teach would only deepen the sense of the importance of true love, and enable people more accurately to ascertain for themselves whether a given person would be likely to maintain lifelong affection and permanent faithfulness or not.

And I would close with these words: In their sphere the teachings of Wm. Byrd Powell concerning temperamental adaptation in marriage are not second in importance and value for the welfare of mankind to those of any person this country ever produced; and I urge every reader of Lucifer to become acquainted with them.

COMMENT.

Lucifer does not regard temperamentology as the "queer, curious notion of some quirky people," but it does think that something else is more important to human happiness and to race improvement than a technical knowledge of temperaments would give. So many things are involved in this problem that probably only a small minority of people could ever be experts in the science—if science it can be called, and before a genuine sex passion all other considerations are but chaff and stubble before flames driven by a high wind. A far better teacher of what is right and proper in mating for health and happiness and for offspring is the unconscious or subconscious intelligence called "love,"—the attractive force sometimes termed sex-magnetism. Were this force unperverted or uneducated in the anti-natural codes of artificial human society it is believed not many serious mistakes would be made in the matter of temperaments.

Add to this, as a primary condition, freedom of natural selection, the right to choose and to correct one's mistakes of choice, without appealing to a divorce court, with its publicity, its expense and its delays, and we would have better reason to hope for personal happiness of parents and for superior endowment of offspring than from any education that a College of Temperamentology could bestow without such freedom of the affections, and without the right to correct one's mistakes by a new adjustment, or by new adjustments.

Study the temperaments by all means, but let the unperverted and untrammelled impulses of nature be the chief guide in a matter so important as race reproduction. M. H.

LEGAL TENDER. In order that a coin shall exchange owners, it becomes necessary that the parties shall agree upon its weight. This cannot be exactly determined by weighing it, unless it is known how much alloy it contains. The gold coined by the government contains a known amount of pure gold. The unit has a specific name given to it, in this country being called a dollar. This is a legal tender in the payment of debts simply because when a man promises to pay "dollars" it can only mean what the government of the country has designated as dollars. If a man promises to pay anything else than dollars, to tender these coins would not be a payment of the debt. There is no obligation upon anyone to receive them for work or for property; that is merely a matter of general convenience; and the price of the work or of the property is set so as to cover the estimated value of the dollars. When debts are incurred the amount also depends upon their estimated value.

It has been found more convenient, instead of exchanging dollars, to exchange promises to pay dollars, for which the dollars could be obtained at any time by the holder of the promises to pay. The only way to enforce the payment of a debt is by the aid of the government; and the government has declared that it will not consider as dollars canceling a debt, any other dollars than those which it has coined and knows the weight of and has declared legal tender; and in the second place that it will not oblige the debtor to exchange the notes for the coins, but will consider a debt canceled when notes are tendered for which the government will pay the dollars on presentation. That is all there is of the legal tender notes, that the payment of them will be considered by the government as a sufficient reason for not enforcing the payment of the promised coin.

Any laws or legal decisions inconsistent with this, are either unjust or else relate to branches not yet reached.

CHAPTER XXVII.

"Frank! You? Where did you come from?" turning to the dark form that in the darkness had stepped to her side. The old reckless laugh rang upon the still night air:

"Not afraid of me, sister mine, are you? I have come from somewhere out of the darkness surrounding us, but I am not dangerous. I have never yet done anything worse than steal when I was hungry; but as that happens on an average about twice, sometimes thrice a day I have that unpleasant duty rather often to perform. But what is a fellow to do? The world owes me a living, you know, and exerting myself to the extent of taking something wherever I can place my hand upon it is about as much work as I care to do.

"Say sis," he went on in his reckless manner, to the horror struck girl, "you couldn't give a fellow a little spending money now could you? You are in a pretty feathered nest here, you must admit. I always knew and always said such saintly goodness and such heavenly beauty must have their reward. I knew too you were not quite so innocent as you would have us believe. Say, now, honor bright, how much is this most honored brother-in-law of mine worth? To judge from the appearance of yonder noble mansion and these surrounding grounds, he must command more than a few thousands, and as I would like to put in an appearance at your next grand entertainment a few hundred would not come amiss. You would not like to be ashamed of me, eh?"

Almost paralyzed with horror Imelda listened. Was this man, who was scarcely more than a boy, her brother? Oh, shame, shame! Her brother, born of the same mother! She understood. He thought she was married and he asked her for some of that supposed husband's money. Was it possible that the man sleeping in his far away western grave was the father of them both?

"Well, 'Melda, can't you give a fellow an answer? I am waiting patiently. Gad, but you have managed nicely. It seems I struck it handsome when the brakesman found me snuggled away in a freight car, the other night, and insisted that my room at that particular place was more welcome than my presence. Think I shall remain here, instead of playing tramp any longer. It will certainly be a change. Only I suppose I can't present myself in my present plight at the front door of my illustrious brother-in-law's mansion. So, sis, you will have to fork over some of the shiners so's I can make the desired change."

"Frank!" now broke in Imelda's horror-struck voice. "Frank! Will you stop? How dare you think any of all the terrible things you have been saying? You seem to take it for granted because you find me here in the grounds of a handsome home that it is my own. I am not married, as you seem to think, but am only a servant in the house you see yonder. So you see all your talk about a rich brother-in-law is the veriest nonsense, and the sooner you leave here and find yourself some honest work to do the better it will be for you."

"Look here, Melda," he cried, catching her roughly by the arm, "you can't come any such chaff over me! I want money! I know you have it, and I swear you are going to give it to me." Imelda felt the blood in her veins turning to ice, not from fear, but from the horror that her brother had come to a level such as this.

"Let go of my arm," she said in a calm, even voice. "Have you ever known me to speak a falsehood? I have no money, and what is more, if I had I should not give you a cent. You know me well enough of old to know that I never say what I do not mean; so I repeat, let go of my arm and leave these premises as quickly as possible. Until the time that you can prove yourself a man I forbid you ever to speak to me again. Go to the home of our childhood and at the graves of those to whom you owe your being, make the resolution that you will be a son worthy of your father, and if you can then keep that resolution a time may come in the future that you may again call me sister. Now for the last time, go,"——saying which she brushed his hand from her arm and turning walked quickly away.

She had not proceeded a dozen steps when she ran into the arms of someone standing there in the darkness. A cry broke from her lips. She was almost overcome with terror. Were the grounds infested tonight? Her heart throbbed with such force it seemed she would suffocate. She could not utter a sound. Who was it? She only heard a heavy breathing and on trying to extricate her hands they were held the tighter.

"Don't fear," spoke a voice which sent a new thrill of fear to her heart, for it was the voice of Lawrence Westcot!

"Don't fear, you are quite safe. I have heard the greater part of what transpired a few steps from here, and I will walk with you to the house."

Imelda was too weak to protest much against this offer. She shivered as he drew her arm through his and led her silently to the house, but in spite of her terror and repugnance at his touch she could not but notice that he treated her with profound respect. He led her to the entrance, opened the door and held it for her to pass through.

Without a single word she left him. Scarcely able to keep on her feet she dragged herself up the broad stairway to her room; then without removing any of her clothing, she sank upon the bed whereon she lay long hours without moving so much as a finger. As the morning dawn stole through the windows she rose and disrobed, a storm of sobs shaking the slender figure while tears bedewed her pillow.

On the following day, and on many following days it was difficult to say which of the two, Alice or Imelda, was the paler, the more listless; whether in the depths of the blue or brown eyes lay hidden the keenest pain.

Norman came and went. He saw the change in the girl he loved but could not fathom the cause. He asked if she were sick; a shake of the head was the only answer. It was all she could do to restrain the tears in his presence. It would have been a luxury to sob her unhappy story out upon his breast, but shame sealed her lips. So she bore her sorrow as best she could, and in time its keen edge wore off. Frank seemed to have disappeared as suddenly and completely as he did once before. Now and then, as the memory of that evening more vividly rose before her mind's eye, she would whisper to herself,

"O father! my ever dear father! how thankful I am you did not live to realize all this. How thankful that your proud head has not been bowed with the shame such knowledge would have brought you,"—and as these thoughts seemed to give new strength her own head would be uplifted, while a look of pride could be read in that high-bred face.

Warning.

BY WILLIAM FRANCIS BARRARD.

Uncrown while ye may, ye rulers and kings;
Hide your heads from the wrath to be;
Time hath in store for ye bitter things!

Hear ye the echo of pain as it rings?
'Tis the voice of those who will yet be free.
Uncrown while ye may, ye rulers and kings!

They endure your laughter, your taunts and stings;
But be not loud in your jubilee:
Time hath in store for ye bitter things.

Revenge cometh near; and the wind of her wings
Is heard in the air as the sound of the sea.
Uncrown while ye may, ye rulers and kings!

Forward and backward the pendulum swings,
But its strokes are shortened degree by degree:
Time hath in store for ye bitter things.

When man his servitude from him flings,
And grasps his sword, will ye think to flee?
Uncrown while ye may, ye rulers and kings!
Time hath in store for ye bitter things.

The Money Value of a Wife.

BY E. C. WALKER.

Again has a New York jury awarded to Frederick L. Colwell the sum of $50,000 as damages for the "alienation of his wife's affections" by Dr. Charles A. Tinker. I have before commented on this case, without mention of the names of the principals. It now becomes necessary to pillory the hypocrite, Colwell. Referring to the triumph he has twice won, this model husband says:

> I wish the victory had another champion, but, since it was written that I should suffer, it is well, perhaps, to rejoice that I have had the courage to go through this horrible trial. I have defended the home against the most insidious form of perversity by which it may be attacked and ruined.

What a self-sacrificing hero! Yet how great would have been Mr. Colwell's "courage" if he had been certain in the beginning that he would get the verdict in "defense of the home" but that the damages would be only one cent? Now let him demonstrate that his present unctuous talk is something more than mere gush for the entertainment of the groundlings. Moralists of this school are fond of asserting that the home has other valiant defenders; they tell us that the prostitute guards the home by the sacrifice of her health and happiness, by the giving up of life itself. Surely, such a sacrifice is as much deserving of reward as is the magnificent "courage" of Mr. Colwell in going "through this horrible trial" in pursuit of $50,000. Let him show his appreciation of the heroism of his comrades of the Legion of Home Defenders. Let him hand over that $50,000 for the building of a Refuge for disabled prostitutes. Or he might use it in furthering legislation to protect these unfortunate women against the cruel persecutions of the police.

No doubt Mr. Colwell is the hero he modestly says he is; no doubt he has ever scrupulously refrained from actions that would in the slightest degree smirch the unsullied purity of the home. But he talks like a sneak. Listen to some more of his Uriah Heep oratory:

> I am sorry for Mrs. Colwell, but she has the consolation, if she will only heed it, that the amount of damages awarded by the jury, being the full amount that I claimed, relieves her of a share of the blame which properly belongs to the man who caused her fall while he was in the possession of our absolute confidence. What a yes-on!

The dear, good man! But why does he not give his sympathy a concrete form by dividing the loot with Mrs. Colwell who is relieved, as he says, of a share of the blame attaching to Dr. Tinker, by his (Colwell's) successful foray? But Colwell's logic is as remarkable as his unctuousness. According to his reasoning, a woman whose husband has sued another man for the alienation of her affections is partly vindicated if the jury gives the plaintiff the full amount he claims; that is, if the jury declares its belief that the wife has been guilty of the offense charged. Then, if the jury should refuse to give the husband anything, which refusal callow lawyers and judges construe into a verdict of "not guilty," the poor wife may consider herself branded "adulteress" without any mitigation of sentence, without relief from any "share of the blame"! But let us not be too hasty in sneering Colwell's logic out of court. He is not wholly wrong; his mistake was in saying that the verdict relieved Mrs. Colwell of no more than "a share" of the blame. It relieved her of all the blame, or else the verdict was a crime against Dr. Tinker. If Mrs. Colwell was a piece of property owned in fee simple by her husband, the verdict is just. But if she is a responsible person, an individual capable of choosing and rejecting, then she is either morally under obligation to pay half the damages assessed against Dr. Tinker or neither should pay a cent. They who say that she should pay nothing and the doctor should pay all, insult her; they in effect declare that she is a piece of property without brains or initiative of her own. They who say that both should pay, because Mrs. Colwell and Dr. Tinker have conspired to break a contract which she had made with her husband, in effect declare that the institution of slavery remains and must remain forever a part of the social machinery, for if the husband does not commit an offense against the marriage law which will enable his wife to get a divorce and if he refuses to voluntarily release her from the contract for exclusive sexual association, she must remain his slave to the end of her or his life. And vice versa. Such a conception of the so-called sexual contract is repugnant to justice as understood and interpreted by the best jurists.

Your great man always at last sees something the public don't see. This something he will assuredly persist in asserting, whether with tongue or pencil, to be as he sees it, not as they see it; and all the world in a heap on the other side will not get him to say otherwise. Then, if the world objects to the saying, he may happen to get stoned or burned for it, but that does not in the least matter to him; if the world has no particular objection to the saying, he may get leave to utter it to himself till he dies, and be merely taken for an idiot; that, also, does not matter to him. Matter he will according to what he perceives to be fact, and not at all according to the roaring of Red Sea on the right hand or left of him.—Ruskin.

Freedom of Choice, the Foundation Principle.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

DEAR LILLIAN HARMAN: I am receiving Lucifer regularly and read it with pride and pleasure. When I have finished reading I hand them around to neighbors. I am a tyro in this line of work and thought, and there are several points that I do not fully understand as yet, and would like to get some information that is more explicit relative to sexual knowledge.

Now in regard to "Motherhood in Freedom." Does this mean that any woman who is living with a man can choose any other man for the purpose of procreation as she sees fit?

What is to be understood by complex paternity and how is this accomplished? . . .

CARRIE L——, Oregon.

The idea elucidated in "Motherhood in Freedom" is that a woman should be free to choose the best conditions available when she wishes to become a mother. This includes her right to choose a man other than her husband if she considers that other man better fitted mentally and physically for fatherhood.

Such choice is necessarily conditional on the willingness of the man she prefers. For instance, a woman may live with and love a man who is consumptive or scrofulous, and thereby unfitted for fatherhood. She may be physically able to bear, and both may intensely desire a child. Now conventional morality would say that she must bear a child by her husband or remain childless as long as he shall live. We hold, on the contrary, that to bring a child into life with such a heritage of impaired vitality would be an act of injustice to it, while to deny her right to become the mother of a happy, healthy child is a cruel deprivation to her.

Now suppose that she loves another man, one who is physically sound. Yet her love for her husband renders it impossible for her to leave him. If those immediately concerned desire the child to inherit the health and strength of the man in normal health, by what right can "society" object?

This is but one of millions of possible cases. The idea is that the persons most nearly affected can take all the factors into consideration more fully than can any mere theorizer, and therefore the decision should rest with them. Also, that as the woman has the most at stake, she should cast the deciding vote.

In short, the author does not mean to dictate what a woman must do when she assumes "motherhood in freedom." On the contrary, he advocates the removal of artificial restrictions and advises her to think for herself, to decide on that course of action which she feels will tend toward the highest development of herself and therefore of her child.

"Complex paternity" means, as I understand it, that a prospective mother may properly associate as unrestrainedly and innocently with those of the opposite sex as with her sisters, and with just as much freedom from fear of a possible approach to a conventional "danger line." It has been said in criticism of "Motherhood in Freedom" that "complex" maternity is just as possible as complex paternity; that a woman can obtain from other women and from good books, paintings and statuary, as much help as she can from the society of men. Whether she can or can not is not a question for the author, or for the critic, or for myself to decide. The woman concerned is the one to settle that question for herself, and for no one else. Our self-imposed task is to help, even though ever so little, to mould public opinion so that a woman may as freely choose her associates among the male as among the female sex; so that she may as innocently consult a man as a book; and we hope that soon the day will dawn when the pruriency now existing in the public mind will have vanished, and that people will no longer even "wonder" what degree of friendship exists between any man and woman.

Nothing is secure but life, transition the energizing spirit. No love can be bound by oath or covenant to secure it against a higher love. No truth so sublime but it may be trivial tomorrow in the light of new thoughts. People wish to be settled; only as far as they are unsettled is there any hope for them.—Emerson.

Another Outrage.

BY E. C. WALKER

Yesterday (Feb. 5) "Anthony Comstock, Superintendent of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, and dry nurse of New York's morals," says the "Journal," "raided Henry R. Prowell's book store. For twenty-six years Prowell, an old man, has kept this little shop at 84 Park Row." He deals in old and new books. Comstock has visited the shop several times recently. Yesterday he purchased a book and then went immediately to the Center street police court and got a warrant for Prowell's arrest. With a policeman and an agent of his vicious society Comstock returned to the shop at 7 P. M. Prowell was taken away by the policeman, while Comstock and his subaltern locked up the shop, with themselves inside, and proceeded to appropriate what they wanted.

The "Journal" continues its satirical account: "They began to search the counters and the shelves, to learn just how much vice there was to suppress. They found a number of copies of a book called Tessie's Temptation, which, doubtless, would be dangerous to very young shop girls with weak minds. They also found some works of one Rabelais, that scholars have studied for many years, but that are particularly objectionable to Comstock. They found, too, a book called the Decameron, written, adapted, and edited by a certain Boccaccio, now deceased. This Decameron is full of stories of love and gallantry, and, therefore, should be suppressed.

"In all, Mr. Comstock and his agent collected about 250 books that would simply demoralize Park Row. They packed the books in two big cases, which they sealed. For the books were taken in a push cart to the Oak street station house. If the cases had not been sealed the police reserves there might have sat up all night reading Rabelais or the Decameron, and so have ruined their chances of promotion with Commissioners Roosevelt and Andrews."

It will be seen that most of the books stolen are classics. They have been displayed on the shelves and in the windows of the shop for years; no attempt has been made to hide them. Yet Comstock will weigh his booty and add it to the "tons" of "obscene" matter he has in the collection of which he boasts so much. It has often been asked, By what authority does Comstock seize as obscene books and pictures which neither judge nor jury has officially declared to be obscene? The answer is, By the authority of his own sweet will and the stupidity and cowardice of the people of this country. Comstock is accuser, judge and jury. This is not said to indicate my belief that a judge or jury has a particle more right than Comstock has to condemn and confiscate the books and pictures of other people for I well know that they have no such right; but I call attention to the vice agent's high-handed proceedings because he and his supporters profess to be sticklers for the letter of the law, and to hate "anarchy" with a deadly hatred. In fact, however, the law is for Comstock merely a convenient shelter under which he can gratify without danger to his precious person his invasive and predatory instincts.

Reformers in a Mix.

Parkhurst, Comstock, Charlotte Smith.
Reformation seems a myth
When you wrangle overmuch
Over legacies and such.
Splitting hairs and talking creed
While the backs of children bleed;
While you cavil, carp and cant
Women sin or die of want.
Ne'er a "nude" must be displayed—
Raise a mighty hue and cry—
Crush the vicious cycle maid—
Let the children die.
Carp and cavil all day long—
Children steal and girls go wrong—
Children who have never heard
Of the "nude in art" a word.
Girls who never saw a wheel
Sin to buy a decent meal—
Reformation seems a myth,

Law Enforced Irresponsibility.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

Commenting on an article entitled "The Growth of the French Canadian Race in America," by Prof. Davidson, in the "Annals of the American Academy," the "Review of Reviews" says: "The good French Canadian Catholic would, of course, shrink with horror from such an unnatural crime as limiting his family before birth; but as the figures prove, he and his religion see nothing repugnant either to God or man in allowing the surplus unwanted children to die after they are born."

The President of the Conseil d' Hygiene of the Province of Quebec, writing to Mr. Davidson of the causes of the infant mortality says: "For one, the first cause of the heavy infant mortality among the French Canadians is their very heavy natality, each family being composed of an average of twelve children, and instances of families of fifteen, eighteen, and even twenty-four children being not uncommon. The superabundance of children renders, I think, parents less careful about them. . . . . In a word, I think that want of proper care in every way is the principal cause of this heavy infantil mortality."

This is merely a glaring illustration of the failure of injected "morality." Church and state unite in the attempt to keep men and women ignorant of their sexual functions and needs. They succeed; but the ignorance which bred the child in dull indifference to adverse conditions can not all in a moment, at the birth of the infant, become wisdom, enabling the parents to rear it in health and strength despite such conditions of poverty and incessant increase of the family. The State makes prevention of conception a crime, the Church declares it a sin. Both unite in enforcing the submission of woman to her husband. "The Lord giveth," is a dictum which has for its inevitable corollary, "The Lord hath taken away." Why, then, accuse the parents of neglect?

Self-love is not so vile a thing
As self-neglecting.—Shakespeare.

The One Unassailable Argument.

BY HENRY E. ALLEN.

There is one argument that stands like adamant before all the attacks of ignorance and superstition. It cannot be—it never has been refuted. It is this:

Every couple living continuously together as man and wife for ten years, more or less, will find at the end of this time that the sexual vigor of one or both will be impaired or destroyed.

If it be true that the continuous and exclusive association of two persons under our present marriage system will eventually undermine sexual vigor it is certainly an important fact, for it is well known that the impairment of sexual vigor means a long step toward the grave. This fact alone should be considered of sufficient importance for the revision of every creed in christendom,—for the repeal of every law against the diffusion of knowledge.

Every reader of these words can readily verify this fact in his own acquaintance. It is a fact no well-informed physician will dare deny. Think of the gall and effrontery it requires to claim for our present marriage system divine origin, and that the principles for which Moses Harman has been battling for more than a quarter of a century—woman's sexual and economic freedom—are not best for the happiness and well-being of the race!

The world is full of dense ignorance, but it seems actually impenetrable in matters pertaining to sexual science.

To me direct legislation furnishes the only star of hope in the murky political sky for the repeal of present unreasonable laws which enforce ignorance on these vital questions. Even agitation is impossible so long as a few bigots stand guard at the door of every American home in the interest of the undertaker. Without direct legislation our so-called free press will soon be about as much of a reality as the prosperity of Marcus Aurelius Hanna. Isn't it in fact but a shadow now? Let us all pray that Loud may soon ascend to glory,—wouldn't that be glorious?

For let a man once show the world that he feels Afraid of its bark, 'twill fly at his heels;
Let him fearlessly face it, 'twill leave him alone,
But 'twill fawn at his feet if he flings it a bone.
—Owen Meredith.

Sociologic Lesson. No XXXI.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

FIAT MONEY. The facility with which business transactions can be carried on with notes, has led sometimes to the compulsory use of notes as fiat money, with the authority of the government, and sometimes to the demand that fiat money shall replace our whole system of money. A man voluntarily accepts a note instead of coin, when he knows that he can at will obtain the coin for it, and that in the meantime it will be more convenient for him to use the note. It is lighter to carry, more readily counted, less liable to be accidentally lost. If the government forces a man to whom gold has been promised, to receive fiat notes in payment, he is defrauded. He has permission from the government to defraud in the same way those whom he owes; but the man who has been saving and owes little, even if a cheat, cannot balance the account in that way. All that is left for him to do is to use the notes in the purchase of other articles, or in payment for services. Here the government cannot help him. The man who owns the articles which he wishes to purchase can fix his own price; the workman can fix his own price for his labor; and the necessary result is that prices will rise in proportion to the danger that the notes will never be redeemed. As in the case of the Continental currency and the Confederate currency, at last there is a total loss.

Those who have finished by making all others think with them have usually been those who began by daring to think for themselves.—Colton.

Frances Willard tells us that when Emma Willard started her school in Vermont, two generations ago, "the wives of good deacons and other folk who were supposed to know" would not listen to examinations on physiology. They thought it was "not womanly" to know anything of the bones and organs of their bodies, nor would they permit their daughters to study physiology. Miss Willard truly says: "The good women were not gifted with the scientific mind; but the world will some day have that kind of a mind so generally diffused that any subject whatever, if dealt with in terms of science, can be spoken and written about; for it is doubtless a principle that nothing that is fit to be done is unfit to be spoken of, if the terms used are scientific." If this is true—as it unquestionably is—what verdict will the scientific mind of the world, in that future day, pass upon the action of a court which could sentence a man to imprisonment for denouncing rape, in "scientific terms"? If "nothing that is fit to be done is unfit to be spoken of," why was it considered fit for a man to outrage his wife, but unfit for that fact to be mentioned in a paper? Had that crime been perpetrated by the man on a woman not his wife, he would have been lynched. But as the woman was his wife the editor who published the denunciation was sentenced to imprisonment, while the husband was unmolested. Yet it is claimed that "marriage protects woman." L. H.

There is no virtue which is final; all are initial. The virtues of society are vices of the saint. The terror of reform is the discovery that we must cast away one virtue, of what we have always esteemed such, into the same pit that has consumed our grosser vices.—Emerson.

CLARENCE S. DARROW delivered the address before the Chicago Secular Union, on Sunday evening the 14th, at Commandery Hall, Masonic Temple. His lecture was entitled "Rubayyat," suggested by an old Persian poem by an ancient Agnostic. The announcement that Mr. Darrow would speak called out a large audience that listened with marked attention while the orator read in an easy conversational tone what he himself considers the best effort of his life. The Secular Union meets every Sunday evening in the Masonic Temple.

Objections to the New Form.

While the change of Lucifer's form from the folio to the quarto meets general approval a few of our old and helpful friends object in words like these:

"If I could have been consulted in time," says one, "I would have said, 'No.' The best use Lucifer can be put to is not to file it away for binding but keep it going. Let each subscriber send it or lend it to a friend and thus help to educate the masses towards a higher and better plane of morality."

Another says, 'Any change is bad. People want to see that which they are accustomed to seeing."

In regard to the first objection it is respectfully replied that both ends can easily be practicalized, with just a little thought and care. Those who wish to keep a file for binding, and for future reference, now have Lucifer in better shape for that purpose, and if they wish to send a copy or any number of copies to friends, all they have to do is to ask, and they will promptly be supplied. Or, if two or more copies are desired every week, so that the subscriber can always have a copy to lend or give away, we will say here and now that we have always printed a surplus over the regular demand for subscription and exchanges, for missionary use. Some of our friends have sent money to sustain the missionary department of the publication, and hence we are ready and anxious to fill all orders for extra copies for distribution.

One of the best methods of missionary work is to send us the names of thoughtful and progressive people to whom samples may be sent direct from the office of publication, and we now and here renew the request often made before, for such names. A few stamps for postage will be very acceptable.

It is by this means, more perhaps than by any other, that Lucifer has reached its present circulation and appreciation.

As to the second objection: There is practically little change in the appearance of Lucifer. Only a little nearer the book or pamphlet form, which cannot be objectionable to many readers.

Censorship of Press Again.

A prominent Chicago editor, Jos. R. Dunlop, editor of the "Chicago Dispatch," was sentenced, some time ago, to two years imprisonment and a fine of one thousand dollars, charged with improper use of the common mails. Appeal was taken to the supreme court of the United States, and on the fifteenth of this month that court affirmed the decision of the lower court, leaving no escape for the defendant except through pardon by the president of the United States. Those who profess to know, say that there is not the slightest probability that Grover Cleveland will use his veto in this case.

The particular charge under which sentence was passed upon Editor Dunlop was that he admitted to his columns advertisements of an "immoral," character—gambling houses and houses of "prostitution."

In his defense published at the time of his "conviction," and republished in his issue of the 15th inst. Mr. Dunlop says:

I had not started a newspaper for the purpose of reforming anybody or anything. I have never engaged in the reform business. I had, however, undertaken to print a newspaper—one not controlled by trusts or other combinations—that should fearlessly give the news as it transpired from day to day in the great cosmopolitan city of Chicago. From one standpoint the class of advertisements referred to appeared to be morally objectionable. From another they served the high moral purpose of disclosing to the world real conditions hitherto concealed. I believed, and still believe, that the publication of these advertisements was a legitimate factor in the evolution of society. A question, however, arose as to whether or not the publication of these advertisement was a violation of the federal laws regulating the postal service of the country. I was myself in doubt on this point, because these laws are susceptible to a very rigid construction. I sought to obtain from the local postoffice authorities official opinion on this point, but failed to elicit anything definite upon which to base the conduct of the paper in that respect. I should state further that no complaint has been made to this office from any source in the Chicago postoffice. On the contrary I had assurance from certain authorities there that the advertisements in question were mailable. Incidentally it may be stated here that the daily mailing of "The Dispatch" was open and aboveboard for over three years, the postoffice officials during that time receiving my check weekly for the transmission of the same, as is customary with all daily newspapers in this city. It was well known to the authorities, and to all those honestly interested in the observance of the postal laws, that "The Dispatch" would promptly have conformed to any request touching the publication of advertisements held to be in violation of law.

Elsewhere in his defense Mr. Dunlop charges that the same class of advertisements for the publication of which he is sentenced, have appeared constantly in the other leading Chicago dailies, and that his conviction is the result of conspiracy, malice and envy, on the part of rival publishers. In his issue of the sixteenth inst. he says:

Fear of "The Dispatch" caused to some extent the concentration in Chicago of republican headquarters and of the leading forces for gold and the trusts. In fear of "The Dispatch" as a business rival and in alarm at its power with the people existed the reason for the business and political conspiracy against it. It was an evil day when two or three newspaper publishers in Chicago sought the service of a perfunctory reform society to crush "The Dispatch" by invoking the technicalities of the federal laws as to the sanctity of the postal service. It was admitted on every side that the editorial columns of "The Dispatch" were pure and clean, and that the tone of its news columns were healthy; but the pharisees found action against "The Dispatch" in that some of its advertisements, though couched in chaste language, were representative of evil.

With the personal character of Mr. Dunlop, or with the moral tone of his paper Lucifer has nothing whatever to do or say. But when a "perfunctory reform society" undertakes to crush a man or a paper, through the machinery of technical and partialistic postal laws, it is time for every lover of freedom and justice to sound the alarm.

Judge Neeley of Chicago, in a recent charge to the grand jury, told them "not to start out with the idea that you are a body of reformers. It is not the province of the grand jury to reform."

If it is not the province of the grand jury to reform anybody, how or where do the postal censors, or the "Society for the Prevention of Vice," get their right or power to act as reformers of the people?

Where do the judges of the United States courts get their right to entertain and act upon charges that simply allege "immorality" without specifying who it is that has been invaded or injured by the alleged immoral acts?

As the "Cleveland Recorder" in a recent issue put it, the right to exclude cannot safely be conceded. "If the government have the right in one case it has it in all cases. The true and only way of dealing with the mails is to open them to all persons without restriction, holding each person responsible for the use he makes of them."

This is equivalent to saying that "liberty and responsibility," or equal freedom, is the basis of good citizenship, and if—as is the theory of our government,—citizenship is the only basis of legal authority there can be no crime against government or law, as such. The only crime that a citizen can commit is a crime against another citizen.

This being the only basis of action in criminal cases it devolves upon the prosecution in the Dunlop case to show who it is that has been injured by his publication of the alleged immoral advertisements; and then, if such injured persons can be found, show to what extent they have been injured.

TRUTH-TELLING NOT PROFITABLE.

It is the right of the accused, always, to state his case in his own way, and this is the way Mr. Dunlop sums up the matter in controversy:

With the initial number of "The Dispatch" I was told by friends that this was not an age in which truth-telling would be profitable; however, I went forward to the duty in hand, and at the close of four years of earnest work I find myself the victim of an unrighteous combination. I have fought the battle for myself and for the people to the very best of my ability, and while, perhaps, a majority of the people have been with me, the money power has been against me.

"Subscription Voluntary."

The "Firebrand," a young and vigorous reform weekly, published at Portland, Oregon, comes to us now enlarged to eight pages, without increase of price—pages same size as before. In fact, in the matter of price, the "Firebrand" makes the somewhat startling statement that hereafter it has no fixed price at all—"Subscription Voluntary," stands at the head of its prospectus, or statement of principles and purposes.

The "Firebrand" is a valiant champion of the principle known as Voluntary Communism—perhaps more correctly called Voluntary Co-operation. It urges the adoption of the "labor check," "co-operative banking," etc. For these and other sufficient reasons Lucifer holds out the right hand of fellowship, and hopes that its new departure in the financial department of journalism will be crowned with triumphant success.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The events recorded in the last chapter had for a while caused to be forced into the background the desire in Imelda's heart to become acquainted with the sisters of Wilbur. The affair with Frank was of a nature so unpleasant that the remembrance of it seemed to crush out all youth and life in the proud sensitive heart, but as time is wont to heal all wounds so also did the effect of that dark night's occurrence gradually vanish. As the days and weeks went by on the ceaseless wings of time Imelda again became interested in what was going on around her.

Toward evening of a sunny day in August when Alice had been feeling better, brighter and stronger than usual she expressed the desire for a drive. Accordingly the carriage was ordered. Both little girls, sweet as snowy blossoms, in fresh white dresses, looking dainty and charming as two little fairies, were lifted upon one of the seats, their lively spirits keeping busy the hands and mind of their young governess. Alice leaned languidly back among the cushions and let her eyes rest alternately upon the glowing landscape and upon the two restless little elves. As it had been quite a while since they had the pleasure of driving with their pretty mamma it was really a treat for the little ones—this driving past pretty gardens filled with gorgeous flowers and trees laden with ripening fruit. Soon they were passing through the more thronged streets when suddenly,—no one knew just how it happened but some boys were playing in the streets. Either in their play or because they had been quarreling among themselves a stone was thrown. Then followed a plunge and a rear of one of the horses, a piercing scream from the inmates of the carriage, and then horses and carriage went plunging down one of the busiest streets—the flying figure of a woman as she hastened to get out of the way—a horrified cry at her having been run down—the figure of a man standing in the path of the runaways, a firm hand grasping the reins of the beasts as with an effort almost superhuman they were brought to a standstill. Snorting, trembling, restive, it was no easy matter to hold them, but the young man with the almost boyish face was equal to the task. A crowd soon gathered around. The carriage door was opened and the frightened ladies and children lifted therefrom. Alice could scarcely keep upon her feet. Just then it was remarked that someone had been run over and injured,—a young girl, someone else added. At hearing this Alice would have fallen had not Imelda caught the swaying figure in her arms.

"Oh," she cried, 'I hope she is not killed or seriously injured. We must find out who she is and how badly she has been hurt, and—oh, wait! Where is the young man who so bravely rescued us, perilling his own life to save ours. Where is he? Who is he?"

Upon looking round they found that he was still holding the horses, patting and coaxing them, speaking to them as if they were intelligent beings, while the driver was also busy trying to pacify them. Upon request someone spoke to the young stranger, telling him that the ladies whom he had just rescued wished to speak to him. A comic grimace for a moment distorted the handsome face, then a merry smile played about the ripe red lips, then quickly stepping to the sidewalk, he dropped his hat and bowing asked if he could be of any further service. As he stood with uncovered head awaiting the pleasure of the ladies a sensation flashed through Imelda's mind that some where she had seen this face before. The pose of the head, a trick of the hand, even the very smile playing about the lips seemed familiar, but she found it impossible to place the resemblance. Alice in the old impulsive manner held out both small white hands to him.

"You will permit me to thank you, will you not, for the service you have done us today? But for your daring bravery we might all have been killed." The boyish face dimpled all over with sunny smiles, as he tossed the fair hair from the heated and damp brow.

"I beg your pardon lady, but I think almost anyone would have done as much. It was not so wonderful a thing for me to do. I am used to the handling of horses, it was only a spicy adventure, that is all, and if I thereby was of any important service, why, I am only too glad, I can assure you."

"But will you not give us your name? I want to know to whom I am indebted."

During all this time Imelda was studying the youthful face of this stalwart young stranger. Where had she seen that face, or one like it? Meta was clinging to her skirts, her great dark eyes staring at the handsome boy, for he really was little more than that. Little Norma was clinging to her mother and was still sobbing in childish fright. Ignoring the question of the young mother the young man laid his hand upon the head of the sobbing little one, which action hushed the sobs, while she lifted her blue eyes in wonderment to the smiling face.

"Never mind, little pet," said he, "when you are a young lady you will have forgotten all about the naughty fright you have had to day. Don't you think so, little Dark Eyes?"

This last to Meta who never for a moment had let her shining dark orbs wander from the fair face of the young rescuer.

"I don't know," was the naive answer the sweet childish voice made, which provoked a merry peal of laughter from the boyish lips. Alice too was smiling now, but if he thought to divert her thoughts from the question she had asked he was mistaken, for as soon as she could again recall his attention she repeated the request.

"Well now," the young man replied in a hesitating manner, "I really have not done anything worth mentioning, and——"

"Please," interrupted Alice. "I want so much to know. As an additional favor I ask it."

"Very well, then," he answered with a sort of desperation, at the same time hunting in the depths of his pockets and fishing therefrom a bit of pasteboard.

"I believe my name is scrawled on this. If that is of any value to you, you are certainly welcome to it," and with that he handed her the little white card.

"Osmond Leland," Alice read. Like an electric shock did the words thrill Imelda. Her hand caught the arm of her friend.

"What is the name? Read it again. I fear I have not heard aright."

"Osmond Leland," repeated Alice. "I am sure that is the name written very plainly here," and she handed the card to Imelda. The young man began to look with some surprise at the beautiful agitated face of the lady who seemed to find something queer about his name. She turned to him with a quick imperious movement. All in an instant she knew why his face seemed familiar.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Leland, but have you not a sister?" A flush slowly mounted his brow, even to the roots of his hair. The surprised look in his face deepened. Who was this lady that she should ask him such a question?

"I believe I have a sister. Yes, but how could you know of this?"

"Her name is Margaret?" entirely ignoring the latter part of the young man's answer.

"I believe that is her name," he again answered becoming still more mystified.

"And her home is in Chicago, where she lives with your mother?" Again the flush mounted to his brow. There was a little stiffening of the lines about the mouth as he answered somewhat coldly,

"She lives in Chicago with her mother," placing a marked emphasis upon the "her." Imelda noticed it and a pained look crept about her lips. She hesitated, scarcely knowing how to proceed. Alice was watching her. Quickly she understood that the young man who had rendered them such signal service must be the brother of the precious friend of Imelda, whom she herself had learned to love in the short time she had known her, for her own sake. Imelda had told her all the sad story. The boy had been many years under the immediate influence of that worthless father. Had he instilled the poison into his heart? It would almost seem so. How would Imelda proceed? She seemed to hesitate for a few moments, then suddenly,—

"I left Chicago only a few months ago. Margaret Leland was my most precious friend in that great city. A woman pure as pure gold; reared, instructed and cared for by her mother, a woman whose life is consecrated to truth and purity. Margaret Leland and her mother are women whom any man in the land might well be proud to own as sister and mother."

Imelda had spoken quickly, her words savoring just a little of excitement. They sounded like a defense, with just an undercurrent of pleading for justice for those loved ones, to one whom fate had placed in a position where he was ignorant of that which ought to concern him most in life. He seemed to understand her desire. After a slight hesitation, his embarrassment growing greater every moment,

"If the ladies will kindly permit I would be thankful to avail myself of the permission to call upon them."

Imelda reached out her hand.

"I would be so pleased. I will have much to tell you." Alice, in her turn, hastened to express her pleasure, giving him her card, and while she clasped his hand in both of hers she gave him, as a parting salutation,

"Do not forget or hesitate to come. I, too, know both sweet ladies referred to. Let me assure you they are ladies, pure and good." Then giving her driver orders to wait she again spoke to young Leland, telling him that they were anxious to ascertain the truth of what they had heard, that a young girl had been injured; whereupon he offered to accompany them. They retraced their steps the distance of a square, where they found quite a number of people gathered who were discussing the accident. Upon inquiring they found that the girl had been picked up bleeding and in an insensible condition, but that before she could be taken to a hospital a young lady, opposite whose home the accident had occurred, and who had just returned from shopping had opened her hospitable door and had cared for the wounded girl. Some bystanders remarked that in all probability her kind action would not meet the approval of her father, or that of her stepmother. But Miss Wallace, it was replied, had a mind of her own, and usually she followed its dictates. The house was pointed out to Alice and Imelda, and to judge from the outward appearance it was by no means the abode of poverty. Mounting the steps they rang the bell. Upon stating their errand, they were asked to enter.

Young Leland here bade them farewell for the present, promising soon to call at the home of the Westcots. The anxious ladies were then shown into the parlor and left to themselves. They could hear that there was a commotion of some kind. There were hasty steps to and fro; voices in the distance; orders given, etc. After a while the door opened and a beautiful dark-eyed young lady entered. In a voice full and rich she said,

"If I have been rightly informed, you ladies were in the carriage that dashed over the unfortunate girl who has been hurt?"

Both ladies had risen.

"Yes! to our great sorrow, such is the case," said Alice. "Some boys were throwing stones and hitting one of our horses caused the sad accident."

"And were none of you hurt?" looking from one to the other and from them to the little ones.

"No, thank you; not hurt at all. We escaped with only a terrible fright, but the unfortunate young girl,—who is she? Is she seriously injured?"

"Who she is we have as yet no means of ascertaining as she is still unconscious. From appearance she is a working girl; she is very plainly dressed, but there are evident marks of refinement, as though she might have seen better days. How seriously she is hurt we also do not know. As I have said before, she has not yet regained consciousness. We know, however, that she has been hurt about the head. An arm also is broken, but the doctor hopes she is not inwardly injured. She seems to be in a weak condition of body as from recent illness. I have left my sister in charge while I came to you, ladies, so as not to leave you too long in suspense."

It was evident the fair speaker was desirous that her callers would take their leave, as her attention was doubtless required somewhere else. Imelda had not spoken. She experienced again the same sensations as she had when she first saw young Leland. Again the face before her seemed strangely familiar, but she was unable to place it. Was it to be a repetition of her former experience of an hour ago? But how? Alice was in the act of leave-taking, giving minute instructions as to her place o residence in case of an unlooked-for development of the case, for she said:

"I feel as though we are in a measure responsible for the sad accident, and I shall want to know if there be any serious results." Ere the young lady could give an answer Imelda could no longer resist the impulse to speak what was in her mind. Laying her hand upon that of this beautiful stranger,

"I beg your pardon," she said, "but will you kindly tell me with whom I have the honor of speaking? I do so much want to know your name." The great dark eyes sparkled as she answered:

"The favor you ask is but a small one indeed, and easily granted. My name is Edith Wallace."

VARIOUS VOICES.

Wm. Halligan, Ephrata Pa.:—I see by the number on the wrapper that it's time I renew my subscription to the ever welcome Lucifer. It is improving with every issue. To the thoughtful and investigating mind, it is a helpful companion, far reaching in ideas and wisdom, and I am sure those that read it with a pure mind cannot condemn a single article. Enclosed you will find one dollar on subscription.

E. W. Moorman, M. D., Ioka, Iowa:—Through the notices by the editor of the "Freethought Magazine" I have been introduced to Lucifer, and am better pleased with it than with any other publication that finds its way to my table. It points the way I long have sought and mourned because I found it not. Inclosed find one dollar. Send me the January number of "Our New Humanity" and let the balance go on subscription to Lucifer.

Mrs. Leo R. Mathers, Wichita, Kan.:—Our Freethought society is progressing finely, and if you will send me some sample copies of Lucifer I shall distribute them where they will do the most good, and try to get some subscribers. I keep mine to have bound, so do not feel like having them distributed.

[The samples are sent. Hoping many others will do as Mrs. Mathers is doing. It is simply impossible to employ canvassers to get subscribers for Lucifer and "Our New Humanity," and therefore we are compelled to rely upon voluntary co-operation to get our publications circulated, and to get the where withal to pay running expenses. M. H.]

C. H. Lewis, Coloma, Mich.:—I like the face of Lucifer now better than ever before. I hail its coming with delight, because it brings with it the spirit of love and liberty—the freedom of thought with its power to lift humanity out of the priest-ridden ranks of the religious world—out of the cauldron of bigotry, superstition and intolerance where they have been held and stewed by that reason-destroying, and soul-damning old tyrant called credulity. I hate the very word. Away with it, and let us have instead thereof Truth and Reason, because they are

The power that saves the world;
Works out the bad, works in the right—
Has from his throne the tyrant hurled,
And o'er the land sent freedom's light.

Susan Reicherter, Nortonville, Kan.:—If I were a Christian I would say God bless you for sending dear old Lucifer to me, whether I pay for it or not. I would gladly send more money, but to tell the truth we have not been so poor in the last twenty-five years. I feel that Lucifer is destined to fill a great mission. It voices the most needed of all reforms.

The death of Mr. Putnam is a terrible loss. I can hardly believe it is true. I seem to see him yet as I saw him lecturing twelve years ago at Valley Falls.

[We are always glad to get a line from any one of the tried and true friends who helped to light Lucifer's torch, more than sixteen years ago, at Valley Falls, Kan., and who have ever since been contributors with sympathy and material aid, to keep that light burning. Of Lucifer's "Old Guard" none are worthy of more honorable mention than are Susan and John Reicherter, of Jefferson County, Kansas. M. H.]

L. Bridges, Toutley Hall, Wokingham, Berks., England:—Mrs. Stuart wishes me to tell you she has now all the copies of "Our New Humanity" for last year and January of this year. She sends two dollars to continue it. She values it greatly. She would like also three or four copies of "Motherhood in Freedom," and if any money is over she would much value a good photograph of yourself. If ever you should come to England she would be glad and proud to see you here.

[Lucifer's editor appreciates most highly the good words that from time to time reach him from friends in England, and would be most happy to accept their very kind invitations to visit them at their homes. At present, however, the prospect of satisfying such desire seems very remote, if not impossible of realization. M. H.]

J. Allen Evans, Secretary Liberty Co-operative Association, Hustburg, Tenn.:—Our Co-operative Home has made grand strides in a year's time. The majority of its members take an interest in the sex problem as well as in economics. We have been living on leased land adjacent to Hustburg thus far, but are negotiating for a pretty location within a half mile of the post office for our permanent home. We are not only co-operators for the purpose of bettering our material conditions, but as a school for propagating social reform ideas. When we are another year older we will be prepared to keep open house for the reception of liberty-loving visitors. We would be very glad to recruit a good blacksmith, and if there be one among Lucifer's readers who is tired of isolation and would like to join a band of congenial workers to build up a comfortable and pleasant home, we would be glad to hear from him. We now have an excellent school for our children taught by a little woman who reads Lucifer.

Aunt Elmina:—I am late in speaking a good word for "Our New Humanity" for January 1897, as I had grippe when it came and could not even read it. Like all its predecessors it is "excellent," "good."

It is hard to select a favorite among so many interesting and instructive communications.

I am inclined to think Chavannes correct in the idea that some form of marriage will continue. Probably a simple contract broken or breakable at the will of contractors.

Walker's "Woman's Duty to Bear Children," is full of pregnant thoughts; "Wanted: A New Adam," is plainly and clearly put; Swartz, James and Barry always write soundly, and our own Moses Harman never fails to give us something useful and practical.

Lillian's notice of "The Parson's Dilemma," makes one wish to buy the book.

Long may "Our New Humanity" live to sow good seed for fruitful harvest.

Samuel Carter, Asherville, Kan.:—You know that I always like to be prompt in paying for my paper, but last fall I let my taxes run over and suffer the penalty rather than to sell my corn at ten and a half cents a bushel. The editor of the Boston "Investigator" says that if everyone was as prompt as I have been it would be comparatively an easy task to run a paper. I tell the publishers of my daily paper to keep my copy coming and I will send the money some time. And so I say to you. You are aware that I do not agree with all of your sentiments, but I do admire your manhood and I want to keep company with those who would keep God and Jesus out of our government. We do not need them. We do not need Thanksgiving proclamations when we have nothing to be thankful for. We do not need chaplains in the army or in legislative halls. Neither do we need Sunday legislation in the different states. And while all these things exist we need all the liberal help we can get to keep this government from being transformed into a Christian government.

[The citizens of this country voted and paid enormous sums of money as subsidies to railway companies, and quietly submitted to the policy of giving a large share of the public land to these companies, all with the hope that we would thereby get cheap transportation and cheap exchange of commodities. Now, after the railways have been built and equipped we find the farmers of Kansas, and other western states, burning their corn instead of coal to keep from freezing, while the producers of coal are starving for lack of corn for bread, and all this for want of cheap transportation. The money combine and the railway combines have got the people by the throat. Like the highwayman they "hold up" the real producers of all wealth, that the robbers may spend millions in riotous living; a sample of which was lately seen at the Bradley-Martin ball. M. H.]

THE UNREVEALED RELIGION.

An address of great depth, strength, and beauty. By the veteran, J. K. Ingalls.

"The rainbow is not less beautiful and wonderful to me than to Noah, or to the aborigines, because I understand something of optics and the refraction of light. The rose is not less attractive because botany has taught us to analyze and classify it. The Good of Truth, whether we worship it as an entity or as a personality, or conceive of it as impersonal, is an ever-living and persistent principle man can never cease to revere and admire. And his growth in knowledge and progress in all things refining and elevating to his nature will be promoted, not retarded, by the true but unrevealed, and as yet "unloved religion, 'The Religion of Progress'."

Primitive Christianity: A History for all Reformers.

This work by Prof. J. R. Buchanan shows that the standard Bible is destitute of authenticity and crammed with debasing interpolations and forgeries which have been destructive to every reform making it the greatest calamity ever inflicted on mankind. Primitive Christianity will show that the religion of Jesus was rational democratic brotherhood and that every reform demanded by such advanced thinkers as Paine, Shelley, Robert Owen, Jefferson, Spencer, and the best thinkers of today in reference to social institutions, marriage, land, etc., is sustained by original Christianity. The lives of Jesus and the apostles and other historic revelations are very novel and surprising. Its historic basis is solid, and it must convulse the churches and assist every reform. It will be issued by the first of March and may be obtained by sending the price $2 to Dr. J. R. Buchanan, San Jose, California.

The Soul Supreme.

I sing of a vision far,
Of a thought on high things set,
Of a sight serene,
And a purpose clean,—
A pleasure in all things, great and small,
Loves and loss and the fates that fall,—
Power to hold or forget.
(The fountains are clear as spar!)

Of the happy-wise, sing I,
Consciously, ever to add;
With their search sublime
Thro' space and time,
Their solemn delight in all things true,
Their child-like joy in all things new,
Simple and sweet and glad,
(Cloudless and blue the sky.)

The Overlook my theme,
And the life in the Lifted Land;
Where the nights have balm,
And the days are calm,
The passions serve, and the charms obey,
And the brain is sane that holdeth sway,
Gentle and firm the hand.
(Is it but a dream?)

I sing of the soul supreme,
Of a spirit erect and free,
Too far above
To be harmed by love,
Or fear, or hate, or gain, or loss,
Or to stake its joy on a gambler's toss,
Hold self-empery.
(How the white peaks gleam.)

A Bishop to the Rescue!

BY E. C. WALKER.

In No. 642 of this journal, Lillian Harman very clearly showed that the proposed law for the penal punishment of adultery in the state of New York would result disastrously for woman, provided it could be enforced. If men were frightened by it into "respect for their marital vows" the increase of enforced association in the family would be immense. Wives would be the chief sufferers under such a law. Again, said Mrs. Harman, there are many wives who do not ask for the divorce that easily can be theirs if their husbands have been guilty of adultery and they can prove the fact, and they do not ask because they cannot afford to lose the subsistence for themselves and their children which their husbands now furnish. "It would be interesting to learn how their condition would be improved by taking away five thousand dollars or five years of time from the bread-winner," said the writer. Other weighty objections to the proposed statute have been made in these columns, and to those may be added this: If the law could be enforced, there can be no doubt that thousands of husbands would be driven to association with prostitutes, and the peril of wives thus be greatly increased.

The backers of the bill seem to be oblivious to the fact that women no less than men would be liable under such a law. The adultery of husbands is committed with the wives of other men in a very large proportion of cases, and hence if the law were fairly enforced it might be found that it was as greatly "protective" of men as of women, although, judging by the utterances of its advocates, one would be justified in thinking that men were the only offenders and women the only victims. Among the prominent friends of the bill who have spoken in this way is William Creswell Doane, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Albany, the noted clerical opponent of woman suffrage. He says that the first reason why he supports the measure is because "its object is to make the man as well as the woman suffer." That is to say, when a married man and a married woman break the law, the punishment of the man makes him suffer as his conduct is assumed to have made his wife or the woman who associated with him suffer. Very well; let it stand at that. Then the converse of the proposition must also be true—the punishment of the woman makes her suffer as it is assumed (or should be assumed) that her conduct has made her husband or her illegal associate suffer. In an interview, William of Albany, as the bishop loves to style himself, somewhat modified the assertion he had made before the legislative committee. He said in the interview: "I favored the proposed law because it punished both parties to a crime." Inasmuch as no one is arguing in favor of a law that would punish the woman but let the man go free, the bishop's remark is wholly irrelevant. The real issue is whether the act at which the bill of Mrs. Grannis is aimed is a "crime." As no one has advanced any valid affirmative argument, I need not here consume space on the negative side.

Bishop Doane complains that society does not treat the offending man and the offending woman alike, which is very true, but what better does he expect of a society poisoned through and through with the virus of Judaism and Christianity? "Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression," says the Bible.

The old cry about "collusion" in divorce proceedings is once more made to do duty in place of fact and argument. The mutual desire of the man and woman to separate is inanely held to be the one all-sufficient reason why they should not separate. Why, if agreement bars divorce, should it not bar marriage? Why would it not be as just to compel a woman to marry a man as it is to compel her to live with him after she wants divorce? And vice versa? This "collusion" talk is the veriest drivel. Once more the bishop:

The injunction, "Whom God has joined together let no man put asunder," constitutes one of the most sacred laws of the church. Obedience to this law is essential to the moral health of any person. And yet, to legally break the law of the church, an illegal act is committed with impunity.

I beg your pardon, Bishop Doane, but you are out of your jurisdiction; what is the law of the church has nothing to do with what should be the law of the state. This, constitutionally speaking, is a civil republic, if you please. We who are without the pale of the church are in no way under obligation to submit to the rules which churchmen may devise for themselves. Stick out as faithfully as you please to your "indissoluble tie;" no one proposes to divorce you without your consent. In your turn, please mind your own business. As to the dictum that what "God hath joined together" no man shall put asunder, it will be time enough to seriously consider that when you prove that "God" ever put any two persons together. I take it to be an error to assume that the priest represents God, and that therefore those whom the priest marries are married by God. The priest represents only himself and those who voluntarily choose him as their leader. And it is rank presumption to assert that failure to obey the church's rule of indissolubility in marriage is proof of moral ill-health. How is moral health conserved by living with a man or a woman whom one hates, or with a drunkard, a wife-whipper, or a breeder of imbecile or otherwise diseased children?

"William of Albany" favors Mrs. Grannis' anti-adultery bill because it will reduce the number of divorces in the state; that is to say, he favors it because it will force men and women to live together who do not want to live together, and who, therefore, should not live together. He favors the bill because its effect will be to compel women to submit to associations that are repugnant to them and to bear children to men whom they do not wish to be the fathers of their children. And yet "William of Albany" talks about "moral health!"

Before I close I want to put myself clearly on record as a hater of the words "adultery," "adulterous," "adulterer," and "adulteress," as those words are used in the law and in common speech and writing. I employ the words only because they are understood in a certain way and because to avoid using them would force me to resort to cumbrous circumlocutions. The relations of lovers should never be branded as adulterous; leave that opprobrious characterization for the relations of those husbands and wives and the other men and women who associate without love, in conformity to custom, or for mercenary reasons.

When love begins to sicken and decay,
It useth an enforced ceremony.—Shakespeare.

Another Step Forward.

Radicalism crops out in the most unexpected places in these days of questioning and social unrest. Among the literary women of the present time, none, with the exception of Jeannette L. Gilder, was apparently less likely than Mrs. Amelia E. Barr to support any proposition looking toward the wiping out of the recognized lines between the married and unmarried woman. Yet in the "American Woman's Home Journal," which is the women's part of the New York "Sunday Journal," Mrs. Barr declares that "Marriage alone should not make the 'Mrs.'" I submit that her reasoning is very good, and it will take me some time to get over the pleasant surprise she has given me. May this not be the last forward step taken by Mrs. Barr! Her article appears in the issue of February 14 of the publication named, and I quote most of it below:

"Much has been written on the political and public wrongs of women, but they have a private, personal disability of great significance, from which they can emancipate themselves promptly and perpetually without the aid or interference of men, either as individuals or as legislative bodies.

"For many years I have been a silent witness to the injury and injustice of the prefix 'Miss' when attached to women of mature age and judgment. As soon as a boy casts his knickerbockers and short coats—as soon as the first signs of manhood appear—he discards the prefix 'Master' and assumes the prefix appointed for maturity. Nothing would insult a young man of twenty more than to call him by the immature title of 'Master' instead of 'Mr.' Yet a woman is not permitted by social usage to assume the title of 'Mrs.' until she marries. She may be a woman of great intellect, of great responsibilities; she may be the bread winner of her family; she may be the director, the soul, the spirit of widespread moral enterprises, but if she has not succeeded in getting a husband she is forced to retain the prefix given to school girls. Imagine Mr. Chauncey Depew called 'Master Depew,' or Mr. Tom Platt called 'Master Platt.' Yet there is nothing more incongruous in such appellations than there is in 'Miss' Frances Willard or 'Miss' Florence Nightingale or 'Miss' Harriet Martineau.

"In opposition to this injustice is the equal one of giving the title of 'Mrs.' to any immature, foolish girl who succeeds in getting married. Much virtue in those three consonants 'Mrs.' but why should their influence and dignity come only with a wedding ring? Is a woman imperfect, immature, unworthy of being 'mistress' of herself until some man marries her? Is she to be regarded as a minor until she becomes a wife? Do not years and study, and travel and joy, and sorrow and experiences of all kinds perfect her as well as they do male humanity without the sacrament of matrimony?

"'Miss' is an appropriate and not ugly definition of a girl in her teens, but for that very reason it is totally inappropriate for a mature woman; consequently there is that want of harmony that is offensive, and this indicates itself by a definite want of respect to those who permit themselves to be improperly addressed, no matter how innocently they suffer. For the world takes cognizance only of conditions; it does not trouble itself about the reasons for them. Thus thousands of noble women, smarting under this sense of some intangible shame, marry unsuitably and unhappily merely to get rid of the belittling 'Miss.' Every woman of any experience knows this to be the case.

"Such a belated relic of the dark ages ought now to be forever relegated to its proper place. Girls may be 'Miss' as long as boys are 'Master,' but after a certain age, which women can determine by a consensus of opinion, girls should assume the prefix of maturity whether they are married or unmarried. Till they do so they practically assert that marriage, and marriage only, makes a woman mistress of herself. They practically assert that until a woman marries she is minor in all things. They practically assert that intellect, worth, public and private ability, home responsibilities well filled, spotless reputation, great social and moral reforms, are unworthy of respect in a woman unless she adorns some man and he justifies her in assuming the title of 'Mrs.'

"This is not a difficult reform. The only point that could be urged against it would be that the universal assumption of 'Mrs.' by women out of their teens would make social confusion. But not more so in the case of young women than it does in young men. Father and son distinguish themselves by the insertion of their Christian names, or, if that is the same, the suffix of Jun. Girls could stand in precisely the same relation to their mothers.

"I contend that it is right that women on arriving at the age of maturity—whether married or not married—should have the title of maturity. I contend that it is wrong that women, entitled by every moral, intellectual and social fact to the title of maturity, should remain branded as schoolgirls, immature, unfinished, simply because, either through force of circumstances or inclination, they have remained unmarried.

"Swift as thought the water level changes, if a single drop is removed, and the removal of that drop affects the whole mass. The same law of unity holds as certainly with human affairs and relations; so, then, this is not as small a reform as it at first appears. There is far more in it than meets the eye. Of course, this movement will be criticised by that remarkable thing called Respectability, as every movement altering woman's status has been; for 'Respectability,' tolerant enough about religion, is in arms at once if either the rights or wrongs of women are named, and immediately begins to talk or write about the foundations of Society and the sacredness of home. Women, however, are used to such criticism and survive it."

Democracy has been defined as the principle that 'one man is as good as another, if not a little better.' Anarchy may be defined as the principle that one government is as bad as another, if not a little worse.—Benj. R. Tucker.

Legal Tender.—An Explanation.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

It has been the endeavor, in all civilized countries, to replace personal altercation and violence by governmental enforcement of the payment of debts. In a later Sociologic Lesson I shall refer to this again. In No. 30, I merely considered the question of the meaning of the promise to pay "dollars," and argued that the government could not properly construe such a promise into anything else than a promise to pay gold or its equivalent, since the government has itself defined the term, and the promises have been made by the debtor and accepted by the creditor in view of that definition. All natural and artificial products are upon a basis of equality and equal freedom; and when the premises are made to pay dollars, it is the choice of the people who make the contracts. The selection of gold as the basis for transfer has been the choice of the people, in a large majority of contracts, simply because it has been found the most convenient basis; and it is therefore the survival of the fittest which has made it the basis, more and more exclusively with the extension of commerce.

It should be remembered that every bargain for the exchange of property involves two debts, each party promising to pay the other something. In barter, neither promises to pay dollars; in other contracts of sale, one party promises to pay dollars and the other to pay something else. When the government is called upon to enforce the contract, it enforces the contract as it is made; and it is only the promise to pay dollars which it requires to be kept by paying the dollars in gold, according to the contract, or else by legal tender notes, in which latter case the government assumes the debt and itself pays the promised dollars.

LEGAL TENDER.

Replying to the "Explanation" by Mr. Parkhurst given above I would say that while it might be well to wait until the series of "Sociologic Lessons" is finished before venturing to criticize any one of them I think there are serious objections to such waiting. Each issue of Lucifer is a separate document, a pamphlet, so to speak, that will be read by many people who never saw a copy before, and possibly will never see another. The publication will be judged by the copy seen, and if the author of an important series of articles, like "Sociologic Lessons," indorses, if only by implication, the use of gold-standard money, and if nothing is said to contradict that impression, the reader will at once conclude that Lucifer accepts the gold standard as the best and true doctrine in finance; whereas, all who have read Lucifer for any length of time know that its conductors indorse neither gold nor silver standards, nor any other partialistic discrimination in favor of any commodity, or class of commodities.

Mr. Parkhurst's studies upon the money question seem to have led him to adopt views quite different from those entertained by the writer of these lines. I should like to ask him a question or two:

When did "government define the term" dollar, and make it mean gold only?

Is it not true that dollar properly means a silver coin, weighing about one ounce?

Has not the attempt to make the word dollar mean something else than a silver coin of a definite weight, been the cause and the occasion of infinite wrongs, robberies, crimes and suffering?

Is it true, as you say, that "all natural and artificial products are upon a basis of equality and freedom?"

Is gold now upon this basis of equality with other products?

Is it true, as you say, that the "selection of gold as the basis of transfer has been the choice of the people?"

On the contrary, is it not true that this selection was made by the plutocrats, and their tools the politicians, and not at all by the masses of the people?

Can there be any such thing as "free contract" while constable, sheriff and judge hold the club of "legal tender" over the heads of those who have nothing but their labor, or its products, to exchange for what they need?

Admitting what you say about the "endeavor, in all civilized countries, to replace personal altercation and violence by governmental enforcement of debts," I would ask, has this endeavor been a success?

On the contrary, is it not true that governmental enforcement of payment has greatly promoted altercation and violence—that is, has enabled the rich and powerful to rob the poor through violent, or forceful collection of unjust demands—interest, rents and profits—and by the contraction and expansion of legal tender?

Was not Horace Greeley and other old-time reformers in the right when they advocated the abolition of forceful collection of debts? And if debts were no longer collected by government authority, what use would there be for legal tender?

In regard to Lesson XXXII in this issue, I have only to say that if government would mind its own business, and let the citizens manage their currency and their collections in their own way, there would be no meaning to all this talk of "Fiat Money," difference between gold and "Confederate currency," etc. Confederate currency and the Old Continental currency owed their worthlessness to the worthlessness of the governments that fathered them. Under free competition and survival of the fit, such wholesale depreciations of currency would never occur. M. H.

Sociologic Lesson. No XXXII.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

Good Faith. Fiat money, founded not upon redeemability at the pleasure of the holder but upon government authority, when the government assumes no responsibility for its redemption, at once takes the position of the Confederate curreney. It may sound well to say that it is based upon the good faith of the nation and is redeemable in all articles which are exchangable; but the good faith can only relate to the possessors of the property or of the ability to labor, and these make no agreement as to their prices. It takes two to make a bargain. No man and no government can dictate prices. Suppose wheat to be selling for a dollar a bushel in gold; the owner of wheat may prefer to keep it rather than to sell it for $100 in paper notes which are worthless abroad and likely soon to be worthless here. The carpenter who would work for three dollars a day in gold may prefer to go fishing rather than to work for $300 in useless notes. Fiat money has no value in itself, and can only be exchanged for articles or services which have value, upon such terms as others may choose to impose; and no one violates good faith in refusing to accept them at all.

A Senator Who Resembles Comstock.

New York "Sun."

When the Loud bill relative to the exclusion of books and periodicals from the mails as second-class matter was pending in the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads the other day the room was deluged with samples of the class of books that are transported in great quantities at newspaper rates. A religious society in New York sent a box full of sample copies of obscene literature that will be excluded along with the rest if the bill passes. A Senator came into the room as these books were being placed in a box to be destroyed, and picking up the most salacious one of the lot looked it over and said:

"This is a very vile book; it should not be admitted to the mails in any class."

Then he turned over the leaves, looked at the pictures, and exclaimed:

"Horrible; there should be a law against the publication of books of this kind."

Thereupon he sat down and read the book all through.

The Dunlop Case.

On Sunday the 21st, at Battery D, in this city was witnessed a remarkable scene. This hall is one of the largest in the city with seating capacity for five thousand or more people, and standing room for at least as many more. The hall was densely packed with men and women to hear Editor Joseph Dunlop, of the "Chicago Dispatch," tell his own story as to why it is that he is to go to state prison for two years and to pay a fine of one thousand dollars.

Mr. Dunlop's defense was read by Fitzgerald Murphy, he himself making but a short speech, explaining that his physician had forbidden him to speak in a large hall. The "Chicago Record," Republican, said the auditorium held nearly three thousand. The friends of Mr. Dunlop, more correctly, as I think, put the crowd at ten thousand.

Mr. Dunlop's defense was similar to that republished in last week's Lucifer. He "was warmly applauded" quoting the "Record," "when he rose to speak and again when he sat down. Several baskets of roses were taken to him." Altogether it seems to have been an immense ovation, the first part of which I did not witness, but was lucky enough to get there in time to hear Walter Thomas Mills deliver the chief address of the afternoon. Having secured a seat on the platform near the speaker I heard every word—or would have heard, had it not been for the deafening applause that every now and then drowned the orator's voice.

Mr. Mills is a small man physically, but one of the best platform speakers it has been my good fortune to hear for many a day.

At the close of the speaking Mr. Enoch P. Morgan offered a resolution to the effect that William J. Bryan be requested to intercede with the next president of the United States in behalf of Mr. Dunlop. This resolution was vociferously and unanimously passed.

The following paragraphs from the address of Mr. M taken from the report as published in the "Dispatch" of Monday, give a good idea of the style of the oration and of the manner in which it was received. Speaking of the advertisements for the publication of which Mr. Dunlop was sentenced, Mr. Mills said:

"There is one other thing that I think worse than the advertisements, and that is this great and wicked city of Chicago gathering a part of its revenue from licenses granted to the business in question and then railroading a man to the penitentiary because he gives the post-office addresses of the places where public baths are had." (Great applause and cheering.)

"Listen, listen, listen to me!" (Applause still continuing.) "Joseph E. Dunlop, if he goes to the penitentiary and stays there, does not go there because he published those advertisements. He does not go there because he opened his columns to those offensive advertisements. He goes there under the law, and stays there—if he does stay there—not because within his columns there were offensive advertisements of late, because his paper has been free from advertisements of that nature since his arrest." (Applause.) "It is the 'Journal' and the 'Inter Ocean' that keep up the business." (Great applause.) "Listen! He doesn't go there for his wrongs; they may have been grievous. He does not go there for his faults; they may have been very great. But if he goes there and stays there he goes because, not of offensive advertisements in his paper, but because offense to the money power was there." (Great applause.)

"He did offend the money power, and the money power owns the law. It owns the legislature, it owns the cabinet, it owns the court and owns the offices of the law; it owns nearly all the property, it owns nearly everything we have. It owns everything in the United States worth having except 6,500,000 American citizens." (Wild applause and waving of hats and cries of "Three cheers for Mr. Mills!")

Our Critics Again.

Our worthy cotemporary, "The Firebrand," (Portland, Ore.) in its issue of February 13th has this to say:

"Comrade Addis' article about the Putnam-Collins affair was the only noble and courageous utterance about the affair which has appeared in print so far as I know. The 'Truth Seeker' of course was simply disgusting in its cowardly creeping before the morality of the priests, even Lucifer was extremely careful to remain on 'neutral ground'."

After sharply, and at some length reprimanding the "Arme Teufel" for its inconsistent attitude on the same question the paragraph closes in these words:

"And they leave it to the far-off 'Firebrand' . . . to print the only words about the affair which are worthy of a Freethinker."

As this caustic criticism appeared in the column of editorial "Notes and Comments" I think it proper to say: Lucifer's editor had little to say in regard to the sad affair that ended the earthly career of the President of Secular Union, and the exceptionally brilliant and accomplished young lecturer, May Collins. Mr. Walker went from New York to Boston and thoroughly investigated the matter, made his reports and his comments, and as these took up considerable of Lucifer's space and covered the whole ground, I saw no reason to add more than a few lines.

Lucifer has never been "neutral" on the question of the natural right of women and men to associate in any way that is agreeable to them, so long as they invade not the equal right of others. Lucifer's central thought and most vital contention has ever been the Freedom of Womanhood and Motherhood as the most important of reforms, and this freedom necessarily includes the right to associate, for self-improvement and satisfaction or for reproduction, with any and with all men.

Mr. Putnam was not known, at least not known to me, as a sex-reformer. I was not acquainted with his private life, nor with his opinions on this question, and hence could have little or nothing to say of him in that regard. The same is true in regard to Miss Collins; and there was nothing in the manner of their death that gave an opportunity to say much on this head. If they had been found in bed together, alive or dead, and had been censured therefor, then there would have occurred the opportunity, the "splendid chance for proud and noble utterance," that the "Firebrand" says the social radicals have missed. Then we could have said,

"Show us the woman, man or child that has been injured by this association of Miss Collins and Mr. Putnam, and if such a person can be found, show us the extent of said injury. Then let the injured person or persons begin the work of stoning the culprits, or stoning their memory, if dead, and let every woman and man help to stone them who is now and always has been innocent of wrong-doing in thought, word or deed; and meantime let everybody who is not a Pharisee and hypocrite, join the "Mind Your Own Business Society," and always live a consistent member of that best of all organizations."

In the next number of the "Firebrand," the 21st of February, a column of criticism, signed Clinton Loveridge, is directed against Mr. Walker and Lucifer. Mr. Walker can take care of himself, but when Mr. Loveridge says, "I send this to the 'Firebrand,' feeling sure that Lucifer would not print an article showing 'an unbecoming spirit in a professed Liberal,'" I think it right that Mr. Loveridge should be asked what he means by such left-handed compliments.

If this were the first time that such insinuations against Lucifer's fairness had appeared in the "Firebrand" the uncomplimentary reference might properly be allowed to pass for what it is worth, but under frequent provocation even patience ceases to be a virtue.

If there is a journal printed on Terra Firma, or anywhere else, that has done and suffered more than has Lucifer to vindicate the right of free criticism, I want to make the acquaintance of that journal. I have never refused to print any criticism sent to me by Clinton Loveridge nor by any of his school of thought, so far as I know, while I have not been so fortunate in getting a hearing when I considered myself misrepresented in what seems Mr. Loveridge's favorite journal. M. HARMAN.

The Other Side.

BY LILLIE D. WHITE.

Mr. Harman has long sustained the attitude of a champion of womanhood and motherhood and is deservedly known by a good many people as a firm friend and defender of their cause. But I do not know of a worse slap in the face from the enemy than Mr. Harman gave to motherhood in Lucifer 640 in commenting on a letter from a Massachusetts correspondent who requested her paper stopped because her "misfortune was a fine growth of healthy, loving and fairly happy children without a growth of income."

I do not know of a meaner insult to woman nor a greater presumption on the part of man than the old idea that woman's duty is to bear all the children she possibly can, regardless of her own feelings in the matter, unless it is the equally presumptuous claim that she does wrong in bearing children she wants because her income is not sufficient to support them and in addition keep her subscription paid to her family paper.

It is not because of the number of her children that she and they must be denied the necessaries and comforts of life, but because all the resources of life are gobbled up by a few men (with numerous progeny) who by various means have gained an advancement over the masses of people by which they rob men and women without as well as with children.

There is an unlimited source of every thing needed to sustain life and make it enjoyable enough that every child born may be fully and amply supplied with all it requires to be healthy and happy, if opportunities and resources were free to all who are born.

It is useless, however, to repeat the arguments that Mr. Harman has doubtless heard over and over again during his advocacy of the Malthus superstition. But just as the superstition that woman is in duty bound to God, church, society and the race must be met again and again so we must meet over and over the superstition that the children born will outnumber the "places at nature's table." In my opinion it is positively pernicious for reformers to teach the limiting of children from this standpoint.

To teach women that they owe no duty of maternity to gods or men, that they should have entire control of tha matter is well and good. But the claim that women should not have children because the robber class has not left enough in their hands to support them belongs with such economic rot as "the improvement of the working people can be accomplished by learning how to live on a dollar a week."

There are a good many economic wiseacres trying to teach the people how to fit their necks to the yokes put upon them, but it all helps only to make the yoke heavier and tighter.

I wonder just what number of children over-balances the cost of the "favorite family paper." I know a number of people with five or six or more children who find it easy to pay for all the papers they wish to read, also families of one or two or three children who find it impossible to pay for more than the barest necessaries. I have but two children and I find it impossible to pay for papers I would like to read. I presume the expense that one of them has been would pay several yearly subscriptions, but I pity the person capable of showing such poor taste as to hint to me that I had made a bad bargain in bearing and caring for my children instead of keeping paid the subscription price to Lucifer.

Mr. Harman's correspondent speaks of her children as a "misfortune," but I don't believe she means it or would take it kindly to have any one else say it, for she says they are fine, loving and fairly happy. Such children are not a "misfortune" to any one nor to the world and if the mother does think they are and imbibed that idea from her ten years reading of Lucifer, she might as well have stuck to the Bible; she is mislead by both.

I hope Mr. Harman will tell us how many children a woman may have and avoid the necessity of doing without Lucifer. It will not do to say only as many as they can comfortably support for there is nothing certain about that.

Many parents in good circumstances have had families of one, two or three children and become stranded and penniless, unable to support their children or to pay for Lucifer. Men and women are crushed and beaten in the struggle for existence who never had any children at all and never paid Lucifer a cent.

On the other hand large families of ten or fifteen children have been born in poverty and privation who have prospered and grown rich; occupy high places and can well afford to pay for Lucifer.

Let us know how we may acquire financial independence, and not be denied the reading of Lucifer, by restricting the number of children.

REMARKS.

I have little liking for personal controversy, and more especially when that controversy takes the form of irony and sarcasm, or of lofty assumptions of superior knowledge, superior candor or superior intellectual honesty. Whether such assumption is an indication of maturity of mind and breadth of thought I leave others to judge.

But Lucifer's platform is the freest of the free, and we all know that the most important knowledge is self-knowledge, and that the best if not the only way to get self-knowledge is through seeing ourselves as others see us, and therefore Lucifer gladly welcomes all candid criticisms, whether from friend or foe.

Whether Mrs. White considers herself a friend or a foe to Lucifer and its editor is difficult to make out from the treatment she gives us in the foregoing letter. Giving her the benefit of the doubt, however, and judging from her helpful co-operation in the past I shall assume that she writes as a friend and not as an enemy. "Faithful are the wounds of a friend," says the old adage, and therefore I now submit my intellectual shoulders to her castigations, with as much cheerfulness and docility as a somewhat rebellious juvenile temper will allow.

Ignoring the assumption of superior wisdom, or of superior intellectual honesty, so very apparent in the tone and manner of my critic I will ask our readers to re-read the offending article in Lucifer No. 640, and see for themselves how much ground there is for her animadversions. If the said issue is not to be found we still have copies that will be sent on application.

But for those not familiar with Lucifer's attitude on the economic question I will here recapitulate a little.

First. Lucifer does not give to questions of economic reconstruction the first place in its discussions, not because we consider these of little importance; far from it, but simply because economics are not first in the order of nature. "The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment," is a very true saying, no matter who it was that first said it. There is little difference of opinion among reformers as to the evils of our present economic system. Thousands of papers, books and pamphlets, and hundreds of thousands of orators agree substantially as to the necessity of change in the system, and all demand equal freedom and equal right to nature's opportunities, but where and how to begin the work of practicalizing economic reform is something upon which all are not agreed. Some say we must have better economics before we can have better people; others say we must have better people before we can have better economics. Both are doubtless true, but not equally true.

As often said before in these columns, man—the people—is first, in the order of nature, then the institutions of man—his economic systems. Economics do not make men, although they react powerfully upon their makers, men, and upon all those who endure them—women and children as well.

Our economic and governmental systems, bad as they are, are no worse than the people who make, or who endure them. Evidently then the only natural way to get better economics is to get better people, and the only sure way of getting better people is through natural generation or birth. Second birth —regeneration—has always proved a failure and always must.

Lucifer does not deny the natural right of women to become mothers. On the contrary Lucifer's editor has always insisted on this right—in fact has more than once gone to prison in defense of woman's natural right to own her maternal functions and to practicalize that right without supervision by church or state authority. But Lucifer denies the moral right of woman to bring children into the world when there is no reasonable prospect that they can be born well, or that they can properly be provided for after they are born. On general principles I oppose killing anything that has sentient life, but it is often more criminal to give life than to take it.

Admitting all that has ever been claimed as to the necessity of economic reform, still I ask, how will you obtain it? Under present system of populating the earth economic evils are self-perpetuating! Born of improvident mothers, submissive mothers, enslaved mothers, the undesigned, the haphazard production of the unfit, furnishes the plutocrats with the necessary material for perpetuating their reign. Hence the persistence with which church and state oppose the freedom of woman as wife and mother. Hence the law-enforced ignorance in regard to the reproduction of the race.

Lucifer advocates no "Malthus superstition." Lucifer is no follower of any man or of any woman, but simply asks mothers, prospective mothers, to wake up to a rational sense of their own responsibility in the matter of populating the earth.

All that women need to do to obtain a reconstruction of our present plutocratic economic system, on an equitable basis, is to demand such reconstruction as a condition precedent to further reproduction. A strike of the producers of men would be the most promptly effective of all strikes.

When the queen bee discovers that no honey is being stored in the hive for future use she promptly stops propagating. Though there may be plenty of food in sight for immediate use, and for the near future, her provident instinct tells her it is not safe to go on propagating until production and storing of food is resumed.

Cannot the mothers of men be as wise and as provident as the mothers of bees?

Fifty years ago or more, in this country, it was not so necessary as now to imitate the provident mother bee. Then, although many mothers were injured by overproduction of children, and though the product was doubtless inferior in quality to what it might or should have been, yet there was little danger that there would not be a place at Nature's table for all home-made applicants. Now our paternal government tries to stop immigration of undesirable applicants from foreign lands, but encourages home-production of the unfit by making sex-knowledge a crime; and by keeping mothers ignorant in regard to their own reproductive functions, and by enforcing obedience to the will of their lords.

The agitation of all reforms is useful and necessary, but, as some of us see it, the basic reform, the reform of reforms, is that which will restore to woman her natural right of self-ownership, and that will arouse her to see and to realize that the destiny of the race, for weal or woe, is in her hands

Motherhood and Fatherhood.

BY HELEN S. JOHNSON.

I received your "Motherhood in Freedom" with request to criticize, and only lack of time has kept me from doing so. But I have found time to read it to many different people as we have driven over the country to my meetings. It is a brave, generous article, not dictatory, but thought provoking, and all I can do is to add a few words gleaned from my own consciousness.

I was reared in a home where broad liberal thought prevailed. At fourteen years of age I commenced teaching school and "boarding around," and after rearing a couple of sons to manhood I again commenced "boarding around," and because I loved humanity and was a searcher after truth I have had very many life experiences, and have tried to weigh them well.

I can endorse all you say in regard to the freedom of motherhood. As to the requisites necessary for the creation of the best children, or the way of obtaining them we differ slightly. When a woman loves a man sufficiently to wish a child by him—and I do not believe it possible for either man or woman to endow a child with the best of which each is capable unless both love, each the other, intensely; not love merely on the physical plane but with the threefold power of their natures,—she possesses within her nature the power to glorify that man, even though he be but a very common bit of clay. Whatever she loves—and she cannot go farther than that in endowing her child—she believes he possesses, and will seal ere the days come when love begins to lessen, and she begins to see the man as he is.

Yet I admit the need of the best associations to arouse higher ideals than she yet possesses; and of course spoken words have more power than written, yet I feel women can secure, under freedom, all they need without asking the second or third man's co-operation.

Let these ideas be promulgated and then woman can become a gleaner without arousing uncharitable remarks.

But instead of lessening the responsibilities of fatherhood I would increase them. As motherhood develops, it brings out the best there is in woman, so I believe fatherhood, under proper conditions would develop, up-build, men and "they twain" should devote the necessary time to bringing up that child.

I have seen lovely children from inferior parents, where deep love existed, and inferior children from fine parents, where it was weak or lacking.

My woman's nature says I only want to come in close contact with the one man I love best, and believe I could secure all necessary conditions for the best children I could conceive if we two understood what was needed.

But go on with your good work. More knowledge is needed by us all, on those vital questions.

The hand-shake is the last, the most intense salutation of friendship; it is often the first step in the conquests of love—Montegazza.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXIX.

"Edith Wallace!" echoed Imelda. "Are you a sister of Wilbur Wallace?"

For a moment a look of surprise rested on the face of Miss Wallace; then,

"Is it possible! can it be Imelda Ellwood?"

"I am Imelda Ellwood." In a moment the hands of both fair girls were joined in a firm clasp and, as if drawn together by a strange magnetism, their lips also met.

"Wilbur has told me all about you, but as he did not send me your address, my sister and I had to wait patiently for you to come to us. And this, I suppose," turning again to Alice, "is the lady with whom you make your home?" An introduction followed and instead of dismissing the two Miss Wallace now insisted that they should remain awhile longer. "That is," she added, "if you can pardon my seeming neglect as my attention will have to be a divided one. My sister Hilda is with the patient and the doctor at present and to them I must soon return."

"Take me with you," pleaded Imelda. "I have had a great deal of experience with the sick and maybe shall be able to be of some help to you. Besides, I feel curious to see this girl. I feel somewhat guilty as to the cause of her suffering, although we were the unconscious and unwilling cause. Yet I feel we owe her more than the worn-out phrase, 'I am sorry!'"

Protesting yet consenting, Edith after having again excused herself to Alice, who was by this time reclining in a large easy chair, and having supplied the little ones with a charming picture book, she led the way. Leading her guest up a softly carpeted flight of stairs she noiselessly opened the door into a large airy chamber furnished in light refreshing tints. Snow-white curtains draped the windows while the bright light was toned to a mellow glow by wine-colored blinds.

A sweet-faced young girl was sitting at the side of the snowy-draped bed, watching the pale face on the pillows. So intent was she that she never turned her head at the entrance of the new comers, thinking it was her sister alone that was returning. The light brown hair was a struggling mass of curls that, although brushed and combed, constantly escaped from their confinement. The face was almost colorless, the brow rather low, and the eyes a deep, dark gray. Tender, loving, with a full share of animal spirits, Hilda Wallace was loved wherever she went. Not quite so beautiful as the elder sister, Edith, she was just as attractive in her way.

"How is she, doctor? Do you apprehend any danger?"

The man of science shook his head. "Not immediately," he said, "but she will require careful nursing. She has an ugly cut upon the head and we will have to prevent inflammation or brain fever may set in. It is important to keep her head cool. Do not forget to change the ice bandage every few minutes. The broken arm is nothing serious in itself and will soon be all right, but it may add to the fever the first two or three days. She ought to have been taken to a hospital instantly. I am afraid it may be some time now before she can be removed."

"That is not to be considered," said Edith. "We have room enough and also willing hands that it will do good to get some practice in the art of relieving pain, and if it should prove necessary we can call in the help of a professional nurse. But I wish I knew who she is. I am sure her friends must be very anxious about her."

The doctor merely nodded his head in a grave manner, giving vent to some very expressive grunts. "Very well," he said, "very well; if you are so willing I am sure I am more than satisfied. I know I can trust the patient in your hands, Miss Wallace. You and your sister are a host in yourselves; so in your care I leave her. My part of the work being done for the present I will now go. Should there be an undesirable change, let me know;" and with a few more general instructions he bowed himself out. Edith would have followed but he prevented her from doing so.

"No; I can find the way myself while your place is here—— and——good evening, ladies,"—and he was gone.

Until now Hilda had not spoken a word. Her whole attention was directed to the care of the sick girl, every few moments lifting the cloths from her head and replacing them with cold ones taken from a vessel of ice standing by the bedside. All this time the sufferer never spoke, never moved. Imelda could not see her face as it was turned partly away, and partly concealed in a deep shadow. Edith now spoke,

"Hilda, do you see this lady?" whereupon the girl's head quickly turned.

"O, I did not know that there was anyone here," she said in tones of linquid music. Hastily turning to Imelda "I beg your pardon"—then to Edith, "Whom did you say? I don't understand."

"Which is quite natural," answered Edith smiling, "as I have not said who; and as I know you will never guess I may as well tell you. It is Imelda Ellwood; the young lady Brother Wilbur has so often told us about."

"O! Imelda Ellwood!" exclaimed Hilda, with a glad little cry, her face brightening with a sudden joy. "I am so glad," and impulsively extending both hands she kissed her in greeting.

Just then a smothered sound was heard from the bed. With her well hand the wounded girl grasped the cloth from her head and dashed it across the room.

"Who said Imelda? Where is she? I know of but one Imelda, and she is far away. Ha! ha!" laughing wildly

"I wonder what Imelda would say? my beautiful and good sister Imelda, if she could see me tonight. Would she soil her pure hands to wash mine? I thought I heard someone speak her name. Say, do you know her?"—and her glance traveled unsteadily from face to face. As her eyes rested upon the white face of Imelda they settled there in a stony, set manner. Her lips twitched convulsively as she slowly raised herself upon her well arm. With a quick movement Imelda now cast aside the hat that she still wore. The next instant she had caught the weakened but fever-flushed form in her arms.

"Cora!" She spoke the name calmly, and in a tone of voice tender and gentle, as if the meeting and finding of the wayward sister here was a matter of course. Laying her cool hand upon the heated brow and gently brushing the tangled hair therefrom,

"Cora, be calm and quiet or you will harm yourself. Come, lie down and go to sleep." From the manner in which these words were spoken one would scarce have thought that anything unusual had happened. The influence of both words and manner was instantly felt by the suffering girl. Obediently she permitted herself to be laid back upon the pillows. Her eyes closed. Her hand went up to her head; then to her injured arm, thus indicating where the pain was that tortured her. Hilda had by this time replaced the cold cloths. Low moans escaped the lips of the patient and soon two large tear drops stole from beneath the closed eyelids. Imelda gently brushed them away, now and then murmuring a caressing word so low that only the prostrate girl could hear. Her hand passed back and forth across the fevered brow. The magnetic touch seemed to do her good. Gradually the sufferer became more quiet, and when the parched lips asked for water it was Imelda's hand that passed the cooling drink. In a little while the breathing became more regular, and presently Cora was asleep.

In all this time there had not been spoken one word of explanation. Whatever of curiosity the sisters may have felt none was expressed. Quietly they waited until their guest should of her own accord explain what seemed so strange. When Imelda felt certain that her sister was fast asleep she gently withdrew her hands and raising her eyes to those of Edith she indicated that she wished to speak to her. Not wishing to make the least sound in the sick room the two went out together, leaving Hilda once more to watch with loving care at the bed-side.

As soon as the door was closed upon their retreating figures Imelda turned and looked Edith Wallace full in the face. It was an ordeal she felt called upon to pass through, and though a severe one she resolved to meet it bravely.

"Do you understand what that girl is to me?" pointing to the door of the room wherein the sick girl lay.

"I have an inkling," replied Edith, "but do not quite understand."

"She is my sister!" Like a wail the words came from Imelda's lips. She had managed to hide her real feelings while in the atmosphere of the sick room, but now she was in danger of losing control of herself.

The Price of Virtue.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CHASE.

What is thy virtue's princely price,
Oh, gentle maid
With modest mien and eyes of blue,
Wherein thy soul's sweet innocence I view?
Immaculate thou seemest, perfect, fair,
Oh, modest maid!
Too pure for earth which fate hath sent thee to,

Pale, cloistered nuns in convent walls
May fast and pray,
And yet, removed from outer tempt,
From riotous secret lust be not exempt.
The laws of God and man oft forceless prove
When passions sway
Too pliant souls with their commands peremptt.

Thou mingiest with the world, and yet
Of it art not.
Pure as the snow born in the night,
Flawless as perfect gem exposed to light,
Convention's irksome code ne'er galleth thee,
And ne'er a spot
Doth mar thy virtue's pure, celestial white,

But what is, then, the princely price,
My pretty maid,
Paid by the world for virtue thine?
Paid that the star of Chastity may shine
With dazzling luster in a darksome world?
Temptation stayed
By thee, while others to its lures resign!

Thy sisters, gentle as thou art,
With hearts more warm,
Who yield to lawless Love's sweet call,
Must, under its grand impulse, forfeit all
Of man's respect and woman's sympathy;
And all the charm
Of other virtues hinders not their fall.

A thousand wretched, ruined homes,
That thou mightst be Respected! Then, is love a vice?
A thousand sisters' lives we sacrifice
T' appease the monster fetich, Chastity!
And all for thee.
But, 's thy virtue worth the awful price?

Popular Follies and Crimes.

BY JAMES S. DENSON.

In one day's session of the New York senate four "straws" were laid out for the inspection of the people. More revenue was wanted—of course—and so these three propositions were made: First, to tax more heavily the estates of millionaires. Second, to levy a tax on the capital stock of trust companies. Third, to levy a tax on the franchises of companies which have obtained their corporate grants without expense. All of these suggestions proved to be unsatisfactory to the solons. So we have three of one kind of "straws." Then the Senate adopted a bill exempting $9,000,000 of canal bonds from taxation. That was the other "straw."

The necessity of thoroughly examining a charge of sexual outrage has often been insisted upon in these columns. Here is another case in point: In Hackensack, N. J., Peter Smarenbeck, seventy-two year old, stood in the dock charged with assault upon a child of nine years. She told her story glibly. Then Dr. St. John testified professionally that the story was entirely untrue. And then it came out that the old man, being without home or friends, had about a year ago deeded to the parents of the girl property worth $5,000 for a consideration of one dollar, the Webers agreeing that they would give Smarenbeck a home, care for him, and feed and clothe him while he lived. The scheme was to get him into prison under so long a sentence that he could not possibly outlive it, for the New Jersey law does not give the judge much discretion in imposing sentences for offenses of the kind alleged. Acting on the orders of Judge Van Valen, the jury at once acquitted Smarenbeck.

The legislature of Nevada has passed a law legalizing prize-fighting—"glove contests." This is a joke on the good men and women who have had so much to say about the "lawlessness" of the sporting fraternity, and who assume that illegality and wickedness are synonymous. But they do not take the joke good-humoredly. Here, to illustrate, is Rev. Thomas Dixon, Jr., who says that "healthy amusement and pure sport should receive all possible encouragement, but that which inclines to lower the moral tone of the nation should not be tolerated for an instant." The reverend robin-shooter has suddenly developed a case of very tender conscience. To some of the old Inquisitors the theater appeared most dangerous to "the moral tone of the nation," while burning men alive to cure them of heresy was made the occasion for furnishing the believing multitude with an abundance of "healthy amusement and pure sport." So much for the "clerical mind," then and now. The cowardly mangling of helpless birds for "sport" is a "healthy amusement," but when two men willingly meet for a contest of skill and endurance, the spectacle is declared to be one that must "lower the moral tone of the whole nation." Introversion of ideas seems to be a more common complaint now in the profession than "clergyman's sore-throat." By the way, how did "the nation" become the happy possessor of a "moral tone," and what is "the nation," anyway?

At the Barclay street ferry in New York a short time ago a German girl, Ida Albrecht, attacked Charles Reinhardt, of Hoboken, with a cat-o'-nine-tails. When they were both taken to the station house, the girl said that Reinhardt had been paying attention to her for two months under the pretense that he intended to marry her. By accident she discovered that he had a wife and child. She went to two police stations in the attempt to secure his arrest, but the officers told her she must have a warrant. Hence her effort in the line of personal correction. When Mrs. Reinhardt was seen by the reporter she said:

It serves him right. I am glad she thrashed him, and only regret that she didn't give him more. I have known all along about his goings on with that Albrecht girl.

Such disgraceful episodes do not characterize the love-making of social radicals. Free men and women do not try to obtain love by means of trickery. It is marriage that encourages and makes necessary the cultivation of the talents of the confidence operator. In this instance, it is ninety-nine to one that Mrs. Reinhardt is so bitter against her husband, not because he lied to Miss Albrecht, but because he loved Miss Albrecht. Lying is forgivable, even when the lie is used against ourselves, but unconventional love, like the sin against the Holy Ghost, is an unpardonable offense. "That Albrecht girl"! Note the malignity of contempt in that expression! How much "sweetness and light" there is in the monogamic ideal! Especially sweetness.

A Proposed Atrocity of Legislation.

BY E. C. WALKER.

TOPEKA, KAN., Feb. 14.—The House Committee on Public Health will tomorrow make a favorable report on Botkin's bill, which does away with a penitentiary sentence for men convicted of assaulting women, and substitutes therefor the penalty of emasculation. For two weeks the Social Purity League of Topeka, composed of some of the most respected women in this city, have been urging the passage of this bill. Mrs. Lucie O. Case, the president, and Miss Eva Harding, a physician, have been especially active. They claim enough votes in both houses to pass the law, and have secured the promise of Gov. Leedy's signature. They say it is a measure in the interest of moral reform, and that, following the lead of Kansas, ten other states will have the same law at the next session of their legislatures.—Press Dispatches

If the Reverend Mr. Botkin's measure is intended to punish and prevent crime why was it referred to the Committee on Public Health? Would a bill intended to deter men from murdering or stealing have been sent to that committee? And why has it so persistently been urged by the Social Purity League? Assault upon women is a crime; a woman assaulted is not rendered impure, any more than a man whose watch has been stolen is morally degraded. The facts are that the Purity League people are engaged in a crusade to force their notions of purity on the people of the state; they secured a revision of the laws of Kansas raising the age-of-consent to eighteen years; it is not the idea of justice that mainly dominates them, but the idea of morality; they are not actuated chiefly by the desire to protect women against actual rape, but against constructive rape. That is, they would not hesitate to submit to the terrible penalty of emasculation any man who had associated with a girl under eighteen years of age, even though she lacked but a day of that age and was a woman in every respect, fully consenting to the act that doomed her lover to a hell upon earth. If these women and preacher-legislators are so anxious to protect women against outrage why do they not make their bill cover the cases of wives who are forced to submit to the advances of their husbands?

The measure is vicious in every way. There are scores of valid reasons why such a penalty should not be inflicted. These reasons will occur to every person who thinks. No irremediable punishment should be inflicted for any crime. Death and mutilation are barred by civilization. In all cases of circumstantial evidence there is room for a reversal of the verdict of the jury when all the facts are known. No man, no woman, should be put beyond the reach of the rescuing hand of justice. Either death or mutilation fix without possible remedy the fate of the victim, no matter how innocent the discovery of new evidence may prove him to be. Every day we read of men who have been found to be innocent of the offenses with which they were charged, but who were convicted and sent to prison when first tried. But imprisonment is not death nor mutilation; while life and virility remain there is hope. The charge of assault is one easily made and one as easily "proved" when undiscriminating sympathy for the woman sways the jury. But we know how often disappointed love, envy, jealousy, and other of the worst of human passions inspire the accusation, and how difficult often it is for the man to establish his innocence. For these and allied reasons no irremediable penalty should be inflicted by the law. Then, again, when the law is cruel the mob is encouraged to be cruel, and we well know that as a rule, the mob first executes and then tries. Once more, the crime of rape, while very serious, does not necessarily mean the permanent injury of the victim, and hence to punish the crime by the infliction of a penalty that is irremediable is manifestly unjust. Once men were hanged for stealing, but we have outgrown that barbarism. But as the advocates of emasculation argue that the punishment should be made to "fit the crime," by the removal of the offending members, why do they not plead for the amputation of the hand of the forger or the pickpocket?

The rich and powerful have generally been eager to savagely punish the unfortunate poor whose circumstances have led them into the commission of offenses against property. Not suffering themselves, it was difficult or impossible for them to understand the trials and temptations of the indigent. It is somewhat the same, I opine, with many of the women who are so ready to mutilate men whose passions make them invasive of women. They forget that we are all, men and women, what our heredity and environment force us to be, and that "punishment" is an utterly unscientific term and an unscientific sociological procedure. They do not realize that there is no more virtue in their coldness than there is in the ardor that recks not of consequences to self or to others. They forget that the organization of society is such that women are starving for that which, given to other women without their consent (whether they are or are not the wives of their assailants), is repugnant to them to the utmost degree. They fail to see that the remedy for prevailing ills is not savage revenge, but that the preventives are the scientific education of the young, including the universal inculcation of the knowledge of contraceptics, and the extension of the domain of liberty so that social freedom shall be the heritage of every child born into the world. They do not comprehend that any punishment that coarsens and hardens the inflictors of it and those responsible for it defeats the very end they have in view, by making more criminals than it kills or mutilates.

In two other ways, this proposed Kansas law must operate against itself. In the first place, when death was the penalty for simple robbery, the footpad was under a greater temptation to kill the man he was robbing than he would have been had the punishment been more mild; if he was detected he was to die anyway, and so he was often led to kill in order to get rid of a fatal witness, when otherwise he would have stopped with robbery. So in regard to rape—when the penalty is death or mutilation or even a very long term of imprisonment, the ravisher will be far more likely to add murder to his crime than he would be if the punishment were less severe. In the second place, the legal convictions for rape will be far fewer proportionally to the accusations made than they were when the penalty was imprisonment. The consequences being irremediable, and so awful, the juryman will hesitate long and look very carefully for a flaw in the evidence before he will vote "guilty." As in the case of hanging for murder, many a real criminal will go scott free because the penalty is one that the humane juryman will not be a party to inflicting. Thus the law will become largely inoperative and then there will be the inevitable popular clamor culminating in all the horrors of mob conviction and xecution, including the great increase in the numbers of the nnocent sacrificed. "Epidemic delusions" in some form have always prevailed, and in this instance we are promised that ten states will follow the expected bad example of Kansas.

A New Love Ideal.

BY J. WM. LLOYD.

I hold that in the love-nature of man, as in the external universe, there are two forces always at work, a centrifugal and a centripetal, and that both must have full play in a really normal life. The centripetal force tends toward a center, toward one exclusive love-partner; the centrifugal force tends from the center toward variety and a general love for all persons of the opposite sex. The extreme of one is monogamic marriage, the extreme of the other is promiscuity, but the mal state, the golden mean, is a state in which there is a central love and side loves and each force balances the other in normal action. Every day we see examples of people who have gone to the centripetal extreme. Every hope is fastened with feverish intensity upon one object. There is delirious love, tortured, quivering with fear of death, fickleness, coldness; madly altruistic, deaf to prudence, indifferent to self-right; insanely, often murderously, jealous of the regard of others; sensitive to the extent of disease. If the affections wander, what guilt, bitter recriminations, shame, self-reproach; yet no nature could maintain such morbid intensity of passion forever. If the loved object is lost, dies, what melancholy, madness, heart-breaking, wasting, suicides! Worst of all, how the whole glamour of passion, like an iris-hued bubble, disappears when "all goes well" and the two have spent a year or two in married unity. Viewed by any scientific, reasonable mind the whole phenomena of monogamic love is pathological.

But the other extreme is no better. All our finer instincts call out against those who wander from fancy to fancy, shallow, unstable, deceptive, gross, to whom love and sex are synonymous.

The trouble is that we have forcibly separated what should always be united. There is not the slightest reason why a man should not love one woman above all other women, and, at the same time, love several other women with various degrees of lesser love according to their several relation to the needs of his nature. I say there is no reason in nature against it; there are numberless reasons for it.

In every deep nature, unless there is some central love, some object of supreme regard, some "grand passion," some soul-mate and heart-comrade whose faith and loyalty are as certain as life and the procession of the seasons, there is always a vague unrest, a thirst unquenched, a universe without a center. Again if the liberty of the eyes to admire, of the lips to praise, of the hands to caress, of the heart to love everything lovable, is denied, there is a secret rebellion, an irksome restraint-a dearth of romance and fresh emotion, a lack of growth, and an irritating consciousness of unfulfilled needs and denied experience which will not down, and often leads to restlessness, pain, and even the death of the central love itself.

Centripetal force leads to a natural desire for a central love—a man or woman to be the hero of the heart, capable more than any other of complementing the deeper needs of the lover's nature.

But centrifugal force and the fact that no one person is perfect or can perfectly complement any other, satiety, "reversed magnetism," the ordinary pleasure of change, new experience, gratified curiosity, these lead to a natural desire for less complete love-relations, grading from passionate attachment down to friendship and mere admiration, with other persons of the opposite sex capable of partially complementing the needs of the lover and especially of supplying those qualities lacking in the central love.

A whole new world of joy, peace and higher character dawns upon the human soul when these side loves are recognized as just as innocent, pure and right as the central love itself.

But the possibility of such a state of things has been so long denied that the majority of refined people today (precisely the ones most capable of it) regard it as something that could not be. This is pure superstition and fear of words. I am happy to be able to say positively, from my own experience, from much observation, and from the confessions of many of humanity's best, that it is possible to love several at the same time, to love one person supremely and several others at the same time truly, and for mutual harmony to prevail throughout the entire group of lovers thus related. To the mean, narrow, selfish minds this last statement seems hardest of all. They cannot comprehend how there can be love without greed, suspicion, jealousy. But when the larger life comes in all this is easy. It is purely a matter of education and of moral ideals.

"Your ideal is right. I cannot think of it as anything but my nature is too jealous, I could never endure it," a lady said to me some years ago. But a few weeks ago she wrote me how much she loved a woman who had been her husband's lover. "I love her because she loved him," she wrote. And a gentleman wrote to the woman he loved: "I love your husband because he loves you and is good to you; anybody who truly loves you must be my friend." This is the true spirit, which is perfectly possible to any high nature, and which will some day be as natural and commonplace among men as any other sympathy arising from common devotion and pursuit.

I do not hesitate to say that the time is coming when mutual love for the same man or woman will be regarded as a truer and closer bond than blood relationship itself.

And jealousy will be an unnatural and contemptible crime in the true society of the future.

And here we glimpse the new family of the future. Around each pair of central lovers, by the most natural laws of affinity and magnetism, will gather a group of side lovers, loving the central lovers and each other because of that love. What a beautiful family that would form, what sympathy, what friendship, what hearty comradeship, what a wall of warm hearts and tender arms around the children. And each one free in his own sphere to live and love as he pleases. Each one with a separate life and home.

And that is not all. Mary, who is the central love of John in family No. 1 is the side love of Robert who is the central love of Emma in family No. 2, who is a side love of Fred who is a central love of Isabel in family No. 3. Families in this system will become so mingled and inter-related that society will be like an interwoven garment, with every thread bound to every other by numberless ties, and the only way out of the difficulty will be for all families to join in one great family and the great Federation of Man become an accomplished fact. Just as jealousy, and the monogamic love which justifies it, splits society into fragments, the doctrine of "I love all those who love whom I love" will reunite all into a living and healthy organism, cured of its now infinite antagonism and disease.

Let this be understood clearly, that the above is not an institution, to be enforced by laws and petrified customs, but an ideal to be realized so far as circumstances and the gradual expansion of human character will permit by those who freely accept it.

Free love, as heretofore taught, has been mainly unsuccessful because it has usually taken either the monogamic or the promiscuous extreme. It has either taught that lovers should be "true" to each other—that is exclusive of side loves—or else that permanent love was a delusion and a succession of episodes all that a wise lover could expect.

In the one form it still left the heart cramped and narrowed, in the other it denied the deepest intuitions and cravings of our nature. But in this new ideal, which I present, the two are for the first time reconciled; the beautiful episodes still go on yet at the same time the heart may have a secure home and resting-place.

On another point practical free-love has failed. It has slighted and ignored courtship and in this has greatly erred. Courtship is the most delightful phase of love-life, and the wiser love-culture of the future will endeavor to emphasize and prolong rather than abbreviate it. In nature the female makes the male "woo" her, arouse her admiration and finally her sex-passion by the most brilliant possible display of his beauty, kindness, courage and grace before granting sex-favors. This is the natural order—the gradual stimulation of the sex-passion by the exercise of all other mental and physical delights, in their highest possible expression, first. This is the natural origin of courtship and holds the key to all normal love and sex-relation. No matter what superstitions have been taught, no man who has won a woman's loving and admiring consent by the gradual and full display of all his manly virtues and charms can feel that he has committed a wrong act—his conscience acquits him. And no woman thus won ever yet felt in her soul that she sinned -her womanly instinct is to glory

BACK VOLUMES of Lucifer, at fifty cents per volume to all paid up subscribers to Lucifer, or to "Our New Humanity."

LUCIFER CIRCLE meets at 1394 West Congress street, Tuesday evening, March 16. William Francis Barnard will deliver the opening address.

To Our Friends and Patrons

The Spring months are again with us, when, judging from all past experience, receipts of reform journals fall to a low ebb, and hence if no special effort is made on the part of friends and patrons the publishers of such journals fall behind, and either run in debt or fail to keep up the usual size and regularity of issue, of their publications.

Lucifer and "Our New Humanity" are backed by no publication fund, "guaranty fund," "indemnity fund," or anything of that kind. They depend for their continued existence upon the co-operative aid received through regular subscription rates, and through sales of literature in their line. During the winter months we have made no mention of this matter, and have sent out very few statements of account, and now we hope our good friends and helpers will not take it amiss if we remind them that the efficiency and even the continued existence of our and their publications depend upon the promptness of their remittances.

Offers to Help Lucifer.

Lucifer does not ask for donations of money or of anything else, but when those who have money or goods of any kind are willing to contribute to Lucifer's publication fund we are always glad to accept such aid.

Readers of Lucifer and "Our New Humanity" know that the publication of journals devoted to unpopular reforms is a thankless task, and that but very few if any such journals are self-sustaining. Knowing this some of our readers have offered aid in various ways. One, an inventor and manufacturer of labor-saving manchinery, offers a number of hand mills, to be sold for Lucifer's benefit. This mill has been long in use—several of our friends have purchased of us, and so far as we have heard there is no dissatisfaction. The inventor thus describes it:

"This mill is a great desideratum for those who wish to make their own Graham flour. It takes but a few moments to grind what is used at once, and then you know what your flour or meal is made from, which you do not if you buy ready ground flour, as many millers use the poorest grain for making Graham flour, as it cannot be detected so readily as when made into white or bolted flour. One great advantage with this mill is that it will grind soft, wet grain or nuts without clogging like the ordinarily constructed mill. It will be found of great advantage to country people who raise their own grain and live far from where they can get it ground, and for poor people who can often get a little grain and make their own flour and always have a first class article. At the same time making a large saving in the cost. To introduce this mill the price is placed at but little more than one-half the price at which one of equal capacity can be purchased elsewhere. Price of mill with crank, $3.50; with balance wheel, $4.50." Sent by freight, transportation paid, on receipt of price. Satisfaction guaranteed. Friends who live in Chicago can be supplied at our office. Those living at a distance will receive the mill direct from the manufacturer.

Considerations of economy, so very necessary now in the terrible financial ordeal through which we are all passing, would seem to be sufficient to secure the general adoption of this mill, and yet considerations of health are still more important. All physicians and hygienists agree that one great cause of debility and disease now so prevalent is the impoverished and devitalized flour so generally consumed, by rich and poor alike.

Other friends have made donations of books. Among these donors of books a prominent and very honorable place should be given to the "Legitimation League" of England. The books sent us by this League are the following:

First. "Bar Sinister, and Licit Love," compiled by Oswald Dawson, secretary of the League. This is a remarkably handsome volume of 307 pages, showing in detail the work that has been done in England to emancipate the public mind from slavery to old-time superstitions in regard to what is moral and lawful in the sex-associations of women and men. While more directly concerned with the children commonly called "illegitimate," the work of the League embraces, more or less, the entire subject of stirpiculture and of "Liberty in Love." The book contains four fine full page likenesses—Edith Lanchester, J. Greevz Fisher, J. C. Spence, and Lillian Harman, and is sent prepaid to all applicants for the nominal price of twenty-five cents—a price so ridiculously small that the book seems a gift rather than a purchase to the buyer.

Second. "Dawn of Civilization," by J. C. Spence, vice-president of the Legitimation League. This book is presented as a view of our present civilization, or lack of civilization, as seen by a supposed reviewer who "looks backward" from an elevation that it is hoped the race will have reached a century or two hence. The book treats mainly of government, politics, war, religion, science, education, marriage, wealth and wages. Though not written as a "story," like Bellamy's "Looking Backward," it contains enough of the historic and narrative form to make it interesting to those who object to moralizing and metaphysical methods of some authors. The work is highly commended by many who have read it, and, like the "Bar Sinister," is a marvel of cheapness when the size and excellence of its mechanical get up is considered. The frontispiece is a fine likeness of the author. Sent postpaid for twenty-five cents.

Third. "When Love is Liberty and Nature Law," a lecture by John Badcock, Jr. The name of this pamphlet sufficiently explains its character. It is a vigorous and logical arraignment of canon-law marriage as a solution of the sex problem.

"There needs no vow to bind
Whom not each other seek, but find;
They give and take no pledge or oath;
Nature is the bond of both,"

may take the place of motto for this well printed and every way admirable contribution to sex-reform literature. Price ten cents.

Fourth. "Ought Women to Be Punished for Having too Many Children," by Marie C. Fisher. The last paragraph of this five cent pamphlet sufficiently shows its trend and scope:

"Women require more knowledge, more information, more instruction, both on the population question and on the means of dealing with it practically; they require greater freedom, especially in the married state; they have the best means of judging, each in her own case, what is her duty and power as to maintaining and rearing a sufficient instead of an excessive number of children; they have to bear natural punishments for imprudence in this matter; and under these circumstances society ought to leave to them their heavy responsibility, unimpaired by the enactment of brutalizing penalties."

Fifth. "Rights of Natural Children." Verbatim report of inaugural proceedings of the Legitimation League, with well-executed likenesses of Wordsworth Donisthorpe, Oswald Dawson and Gladys Dawson, president, secretary and treasurer of the League. Price twenty-five cents.

Sixth. "Liberty: Political, Religious, Social and Sexual," by A. F. Tyndall, A. T. C. L. An essay towards the formation of an Anti-Persecution Society to defend the rights of individuals against state interferences and Puritan persecutions. Price five cents. The closing paragraph of this small but valiant exponent of equal freedom reads thus:

"We must have liberty all round. A religious man is not supporting spiritualism or atheism, because he would give the spiritualist and atheist the liberty he himself enjoys. Nor is the man of strict moral principles supporting vice if he attacks the law which tries to put it down. All he means is this—I abhor vice, but I believe your interferences make these things worse; I will go hand in hand with you in trying to do away with these evils, if so they be, but I will depend on education and the persuasive and gentler methods by which all true progress has been effected hitherto. Let then, all lovers of liberty band together to form an Anti-persecution Society, and let this be started by a large and combined public meeting to ventilate the question. Electors! cease to struggle for political nostrums, and band together in the interests of individual freedom."

In addition to these contributions of most excellent sex-reform literature received from friends across the Atlantic, a number of copies of new publications have been dedicated to Lucifer's propaganda fund by authors and publishers near home. Among these, honorable mention should be made of "The Old and the New Ideal. A Solution of that part of the Social Question which pertains to Love, Marriage and Sexual Intercourse," by Emil F. Ruedebusch. This book has been reviewed at some length in Lucifer and needs no praise from the writer of these lines. Suffice it to say that the "Ideal" of Emil Ruedebusch is quite as radical and revolutionary as that outlined by J. Wm. Lloyd in this issue of Lucifer, but amplified and elaborated to a far greater extent than is possible in the brief space occupied by Mr. Lloyd. For chapter topics of the "New Ideal" see advertisement on last page of Lucifer.

Several more books, some new and some old, have been contributed lately to keep Lucifer's light burning. Among them are: "Swept away," by Moses Hull, price 10 cents; "In Hell and The Way Out," by H. E. Allen, 10 cents; "Reasons for Pardoning Fielden, Neebe and Schwab," by John P. Altgeld, 15 cents; Proceedings of the First Kansas Co-operative Congress, held in Representative Hall, Topeka, last April. Persons who are looking for practical ways of self help through co-operation can not do better than to send for this 114-page pamphlet; price 15 cents "To do good and to communicate, forget not," is the advice o an ancient missionary whose mental impress on the world of thought has survived the wear and tear of many centuries. Shall we emulate the good and reject the bad of those old-time propagandists?

It is only foolishness to say that obscenity laws are in the interest of morality; they tend to increase vice, and they discourage honest investigation.

The Pageant at Washington.

The forms of Lucifer, No. 649, are made up Thursday, March 4th. In Chicago the day is dark, gloomy, chilly and cheerless, typical of the mental condition of many thousands, yea, millions, of the subjects of him who is today crowned King of the United States of America—crowned with more of pomp and ceremony, and with more of useless expenditure of money, than often attend the crowning of old world monarchs..

The writer of these lines has no heart to read the sickening details. With thousands starving, or on the brink of starvation—homeless, houseless, begging from door to door for a morsel of food, or for the poor privilege of earning a night's lodging,—how is it possible for sane and humane women and men to spend untold wealth in the attempt to ape the customs of feudalism—of barbaric display of tinsel and gold and precious stones,—is the despair of the philanthropist, the humanitarian philosopher, and the question, "What are we coming to?" remains unanswered if not unanswerable.

Love Ideals.

In all fields of human endeavor, in all departments of human activity, the ideal must precede the effort. First of all must come discontent with what we have; then desire for something better; then the ideal, the image or mental concept of what is desired; last of all the effort to practicalize and realize that ideal.

All human progress depends upon correct or normal ideals, and upon the fidelity with which these ideals are followed and practicalized. In proportion as our lives are made to conform to high, true and normal ideals will success and happiness be ours; and in proportion as our lives are made to conform to low, false and abnormal ideals, will failure, disappointment and unhappiness be the warp and the woof of our life history.

These thoughts are suggested by the article of J. William Lloyd in this week's Lucifer. In no department of life is it so important that ideals should be true and high, as in the department called love—if indeed it be correct to call love a department of life. In the largest sense, or in the last analysis, love and life seem to me to be one and the same. Love is manifested through and by life, and life is manifested by and through love. Love unfolds, magnifies, preserves and glorifies life; life unfolds, preserves, magnifies and glorifies love. Whatever weakens or destroys love weakens and destroys life, and whatever weakens and destroys life weakens and destroys love. The old saying that "love is stronger than death" voices much the same thought; also the well-known lines:

Love is life's end; an end yet never ending.
Love's life's reward; rewarded is rewarding.
If e'er thou liv'st but once love's worth to prove Thou wilt not love to live unless thou live to love.

If these views are based upon truth as it is in nature then no subject can be of greater importance than that treated of by Mr. Lloyd. If the current or popular ideals in regard to love are false, then we need to look no further for causes of the failure of many human lives; nor for the causes of the prevalence of crime, of vices, of poverty and of misery. False standards of love-morality,—false ideals in love, explain it all.

A New Love Ideal.

For the love of the brain and heart being "pure" love, a love that has originated in these and descended in this natural order for its final consummating expression to the genitals is pure throughout, and so felt to be.

But where courtship is disregarded, and, impelled by sex desire only, strangers rush immediately into each other's embrace (thus inverting the natural order and doing first that which should be last) there is an instinctive and natural feeling in both (the stronger as the nature is finer) that they have violated a natural law, deprived themselves of their due delight, lost self-control and some way degraded themselves, and a tendency to part from each other in disgust and shame.

It is in the attempt to express this that all our terms of sexual reproach have originated—"vile," "dirty," "filthy," and the rest. The very act which in its proper place and order is the proudest and most delightful in human consciousness, when out of order is the most ashamed, disgusting and degrading. Women feel this law more deeply than men, and are more sensitive to its action. No matter what the woman's creed or refinement, if her love has been properly called out she gives her body freely; and again, the coarsest woman feels that sex-relations not preceded by finer endearments and emotions are revolting and stupid. And all through the love-life the lovers must maintain courtship and this natural order of relation, or they will at once begin to grow apart and their couch will be the "grave of love."

In brief, true love is that which always reckons with mutual desire, and satisfies the deeper yearnings of the heart and the higher forms of sex-pleasure before descending to the lower. Such love may reasonably be expected to endure, for love is usually brief in exact proportion as it is purely selfish and sexual.

Reserve—never to quite attain—is the secret of charm in courtship as in all pursuit. Free-love, where the lover is never quite possessed, aids this, and the above ideal more than any other. The method of sex-relation, too, practiced by the Oneida Communists was wise in this regard, as aiding to maintain enduring love, but of this I cannot say more here.

As no other force equals the passion of love in its power to call out all the worthy and admirable qualities in human nature —courage, honor, industry, genius, wit, grace, beauty, generosity, so nothing equals repressed or invasive love in its power to call out everything low, mean, cowardly, disgusting and cruel —in producing disease and a weakness which makes all disease possible.

Therefore it is manifest that to elevate and ennoble humanity and lift it to its highest pitch of mental, moral and physical health and development, we must have the highest possible ideal of love, make that love perfectly free, and encourage the greatest possible variety in its normal expression.

For this is true: All other sorrows are light as thistle down on the nature which loves and is truly beloved.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXX.

"Come with me," said Edith, and she led the way to a room at the other end of the hall.

"Here we will be undisturbed, and you can tell me all you wish to impart. But I wish you to understand that I expect you to say nothing that may cause you pain to recall. The fact that this girl is your sister makes her much less a stranger to me than she would otherwise have been. Come, sit here in this chair, here where you will be shaded from the rays of the setting sun. Now, if you are comfortable you may proceed."

What a cosy, home-like room it was. A bright glowing red was the predominating color, softened by the lace curtains and snowy draped bed. Here and there was a dash of gold. The warm hues seemed just suited to the glowing beauty of the girl who sank into a seat opposite the chair wherein she had placed Imelda, and here, in the cool half-dark room, was told the dark story of how this wayward sister had left the home of her childhood to go with her lover.

Of her own suspicion however, that Cora had never been a wife Imelda could not bring herself to speak. How could she know how these sisters would judge? She only told that from the hour that Cora had left her home until now they had never seen her; never heard from her, "and now I am afraid," added Imelda, "she will be a burden upon your hands, an imposition upon your kindness for an indefinite length of time."

"Hush! Not so, my friend," interrupted Edith. "I may call you friend, may I not? Would I not have done as much fo an utter stranger? Why then not do it for one whom my brother holds most dear, meaning yourself, of course; and I can not help accepting your sister in the same light. But," she added smiling, "do you not think we have treated your friend Mrs. Westcot, rather badly considering it is over an hour since we left her alone to pass the time away as best she could,—and now the shades of night are beginning to fall."

Imelda uttered a little frightened cry. "Oh, I had forgotten! Poor Alice. I must go to her at once. But first, if you will permit, I must see if Cora is still resting." So, stopping for a moment to inquire of Hilda as to the condition of the patient, and being assured that she was still asleep and perfectly quiet, the two found their way down the wide stairway to where the little woman had been left to entertain herself. Here they found that that tired little morsel of humanity had fallen fast asleep in the depths of the large arm chair wherein she had settled herself, while the little girls seeing "Mamma" asleep and having been taught at such a time to be very quiet, had climbed into a chair, which Meta had pushed up to a window, and were watching the stream of travel and traffic on the street.

As the door opened little Meta turned her head and seeing Imelda uttered a glad cry. It had been a tiresome task to entertain the baby mind of Norma, and the little heart beat joyfully at the prospect that the charge was over. The cry woke Alice who started up a little confused, but immediately she remembered where she was. Edith apologized for her seeming neglect, but added,

"I am sure you will excuse me when you fully understand. I will go now and see to arranging our simple evening meal, for of course you will take tea with us. In the meantime your friend will make the necessary explanation." With these words, having first lit several gas jets, and ere Alice could formulate a protest she withdrew and left the two friends alone.

But Imelda spoke not a word. Exhausted and broken-hearted she sank into the nearest chair and bowing her head upon her hands her over-charged feelings gave way. Breaking into an uncontrollable fit of weeping, sobs shook the slender figure while tears trickled fast through her fingers.

Alice was speechless. Surprise at this seemingly uncalled-for outburst of feeling seemed for the moment to rob her of the power of utterance. The little ones stood with eyes wide open, wondering why "Aunty Meldy should try!" as little Norma expressed it. By and by Alice collected her wits sufficiently to take the hands of the weeping girl and drawing them from her face asked her what it all meant. When Imelda had somewhat conquered her emotion she said:

"Alice, you have been a true friend to me always. You have made me your confidant in many things. You know much of my earlier life, but not all. You knew I had a sister and brother; you think they are dead, as I simply told you that I had lost them, but the inference is not true. Both have stepped out of my life and have been as dead to me, for several years. I have sometimes almost wished they were indeed dead. Wild and wayward they had cast aside the restraining influence of home and had gone—we knew not whither. Never a sign of life did they send, and my mother went to her grave calling vainly for her absent ones.

"Within the last few weeks, however, the knowledge has come to me that both are alive. Several weeks ago I encountered Frank in the grounds of Maplelawn. Laboring under the misapprehension of believing me to be the mistress of the handsome mansion he asked me for money. Finding that I occupied only a servant's position he had no farther use for me, and disappeared as suddenly as he had appeared. I know not what has again become of him; and"—with a choking feeling in her throat,—"upstairs, with a broken arm and a bleeding head lies my sister Cora! Do you now understand?"

Imelda turned and going to the window gazed blankly into the darkening night. She had spoken hastily and in broken accents, as if ridding herself of a very disagreeable duty. It was not pleasant to speak of these family affairs. For her they meant shame and disgrace, even though her whole being recoiled from word or act impure. Her burning brow was pressed against the cool glass and her hand upon her aching heart. Many indeed were the trials she had been called upon to bear. Had it not been that such rare and true friends had been hers to smooth her rough pathway, and had it not been for the love of a true man's noble heart, she would often have found life not worth the living. As she stood there waiting she knew not for what, a hand stole softly into hers and a gentle voice said,

"Imelda! I am sorry, so sorry for you, but—I wish I had a sister! I have no one in all this wide world that has a claim upon me except my children. There was a time when Lawrence was my heaven, but now!—you know and understand,—that time belongs to the past. You have a sister. Let us hope that the finding of her will prove a blessing to you. The same blood flows in your veins. It were strange indeed if some of the same noble emotions should not also move her heart." Imelda was moved. She had never heard Alice speak with so much depth of feeling. She had not thought her friend possessed so much real character.

"Thank you," she said. "I hope so, indeed; but do you understand? I will now be compelled to remain here for some time to come. The doctor says it will not be advisable to have her removed; so I am in a manner compelled to remain, which means that you will for a time have to do without me."

By the sudden pallor of Alice's cheek it was very plain that she had not thought of that, but bravely she put down all feelings of self.

"Very well, we will get along without you until such time as your sister can with safety be removed; then we will have her brought to Maplelawn where you can nurse her until she shall have perfectly recovered." Imelda started,

"Oh, no! That would be kindness too great to accept. It would be too much; besides how would Mr. Westcot accept the situation? It would be an imposition; there is no gainsaying that. No! no! Alice. I cannot accept your kind offer. As soon as it is safe she will have to be removed to a hospital where I shall make arrangements, if at all possible, to have the care of her. If that cannot be done, why then—I shall have to do the best I can for her."

"Nonsense, Imelda, do not speak like that. Lawrence has never yet refused me an expressed wish, and I certainly do wish to have you near me as much as possible. But there will be time enough to discuss these matters later, for the present it is undoubtedly understood that you remain here. The rest we will trust to future developments. Just now," she said, in order to change the subject, "I wish you would help me to lay this sleeping child upon the tete-a-tete, as she is becoming quite heavy;" and while Imelda was arranging an easy position Edith returned.

Alice was more anxious to return home now, as she would have to do so without her trusted and faithful companion, but Edith insisted on refreshments first, and while they were being partaken of she sent a servant out to have Alice's carriage brought up to the house. But the carriage was already waiting for them, and had been for some time. Osmond Leland had been possessed of forethought enough to attend to that matter. Edith explained to her guests that when she and her sister were alone they dispensed with the culinary art to a great extent, as they were both very fond of fruits, and in the summer it was no difficult thing to always have a variety of fruits on hand.

"Maybe I am a little indolent," she explained smiling, "but I do not like to roast my brains above a great fire, and by the same token I do not like to see someone else do it either; so this is the result."

There was no occasion, however, for Edith to make excuses. The ladies found the simple meal very refreshing. After it was over Imelda told Alice what few articles she deemed it necessary that she should send her; for as a matter of course she would remain for the present, and take upon herself the chief care of the wayward but now suffering sister. With the two sleepy little girls Alice was then snugly tucked away in the carriage and the driver being cautioned to be very careful, replied there was positively no cause to fear. It was not likely that a similar accident would again occur; had it not been for the throwing of that unlucky stone the trustworthy beasts would never have played such pranks. With a wave of the hand Imelda saw the carriage disappear, and with a heavy heart she again ascended the stairs to relieve the patient Hilda, and take upon herself this new duty of nursing back to life wayward, erring Cora. To life? and to what else? The sequel will show.

VARIOUS VOICES.

L. A. Coolidge, Denver:—I think the new form of Lucifer much preferable to the old. It is more convenient to read and preserve. I am much interested in "Hilda's Home". What truths it contains, and how well put. Please send me a copy of "Motherhood in Freedom".

A. E. K. Parkhurst, Brooklyn, N. Y.:—Have read "The Old and The New Ideal" with great interest, and while I cannot agree with the author's application of freedom, I am for freedom all the time, and am willing to trust to its eventually leading to right conditions. Whatever conditions of sex life it establishes—and there will be many—will certainly be right. The utmost freedom consistent with the rights of the individual is what we must have.

Emil L—, Kansas:—Do you know any good way to control conception? Or could you refer me to some one from whom I could get information in regard to this subject?

[Knowledge—or wisdom, which is knowledge applied to useful purposes—is man's best friend; but in this country it is dangerous to impart knowledge on a subject that more nearly concerns human happiness than almost any other, namely, the subject of limiting or controlling the size of families. This knowledge would enable women to choose when and under what circumstances they would become mothers, with the result that fewer and better children would be born. This, in the long-run would result in putting the parasites of human society out of a job. Hence their opposition to allowing mothers to know how to limit the number of their children. M. H.]

N. C. Mitter Pleade, Chupra Sarum, Bengal, India:—I send you ten shillings subscription to Lucifer and "Our New Humanity," and beg to inform you that the perusal of these periodicals has given me much pleasure. I quite agree with you in what you say in Lucifer that there is nothing obscene, and that sex-relations are quite in accord with nature.

[Lucifer's position is that "obscenity" is subjective and not objective. There is no obscenity except in the mind of him who perceives it as such Everything is natural—normally or abnormally natural. That is to say, while everything is a legitimate product of natural causes—efficient or compelling causes, it does not follow that all is healthful and happifying. What is needed to correct abnormal or perverted use of sex in word or deed, is not suppression or prohibition, but education and enlightenment. Then let the fittest survive.

Our East Indian correspondent asks where "obscene books and pictures" can be had. Not having any standard whereby to judge I cannot answer this inquiry. "To the pure all things are pure;" that is, there is nothing without its use, and the pure minded, by investigation, can find that use. Lasciviousness and salacity are signs of abnormality or perversion, due primarily to ignorance, and the pure minded will make use of these symptoms as the physician does the symptoms of disease, and guided by these symptoms try to assist the sufferer to health or sanity. M. H.]

C. C. L., Mo.:—I have no fault to find with your "Motherhood in Freedom," but wish it were possible to adopt eithe this or some other as good method, at once. I think those who find fault with what is therein suggested should tell us of something better, or be willing that this should be given a fair trial. Women everywhere are crying for more liberty. Some are even demanding the exclusive right to their own bodies. Necessity will soon compel something to be done, and it might be far worse than motherhood in freedom.

[The writer of this letter is a public nurse by profession, and hence does not want her name to appear. Like many others whose business brings them into close relations with wronged and suffering mothers she asks us for a sure preventive of conception. She says, "Most of my patients are women in confinement, and could I tell you all the pitiful stories I hear, of enforced motherhood, you would perhaps be startled more than you ever have been,—familiar as you are with the subject. My heart has ached for these helpless mothers and for the little unwelcome babes when I have taken them into my arms. So many of my patients have asked for knowledge in regard to prevention that I have decided, if I can obtain the desired information, that I will do what I can to prevent unwelcome babies and save worn-out women from this awful burden." At present the best I can say is to ask our correspondent to do what she can to encourage women to save themselves by practicalizing the suggestions contained in the little pamphlet "Motherhood in Freedom". All that women need to do to escape the horrors of unwilling motherhood is to unite in demanding self-ownership, and refuse further co-operation with masculine humanity until the demand is heeded. Do this and the "sex revolution" is a thing accomplished. M. H.]

The Good of Truth, whether we worship it as an entity or as a personality, or conceive of it as impersonal, is an ever-living and persistent principle man can never cease to revere and admire. And his growth in knowledge and progress in all things refining and elevating to his nature will be promoted, not retarded, by the true but unrevealed, and as yet "unloved religion, 'The Religion of Progress'."

Sestina of the Red Heart and White World.

My songs have breathed the music oft of love,
And oft intoned a lyric for the free,
And often chanted Nature and her charm;
But now I sing the Red Heart's purpose great,
And sing the White World that this shall become
When men count manhood more than things that serve.

When men count manhood more than things that serve,
We shall not need, I trow, to speak of love;
For, certes, to fit souls sweet love shall come
In nature's course, when first the way is free,
But most of all to those whose thoughts are great,
And least to jealous ones who prison charm.

Monopoly of land and love and charm,
And lust of power unpaid to make men serve,—
These are the things which are not truly great,
And yet this Dark World yields them all its love,
And mocks at those who prophesy the free,
And says, 'neath heaven, the White things cannot come.

Yet, when the Red Heart beats, shall surely come
The White World with its peace and rest and charm,
Its comrades working side by side, yet free,
Each other serving, yet unforced to serve;
Its daily life a garden wherein love
Blooms large, and each man's genius ripens great.

When each man's selfhood grows to ripeness great,
Root-based in Nature, whence all ripe things come,
Its bud and fruiting aye the genius-love
Of perfect skill in dainty feats that charm
And true success in sterner works that serve,—
Art shall be all delightful, being free.

I see my song return to all things free,
It finds no other theme so truly great:
Nature, alone, in freedom, may I serve;
It shall be so with all when White days come,
Wherein no deed of mastership may charm,
Nor goldness check the Red Heart's crimson love.

Comrades, be free! and then the White shall come,
Life's commonplace grow great and rich in charm,
And all hearts Red to serve with human love.

Views of a Veteran.

BY C. L. JAMES.

Judge Foster, in sentencing Moses Harman, compared himself to a lion—and showed he was very like the animal which once might have been taken for a lion had he kept still. According to the Bible, as quoted by Judge Philips, [another of Harman's judges,] Adam and Eve were perfectly content to dispense with clothes until "they passed from that condition of perfectibility." According to the same story, they passed etc. through listening to the devil. Therefore, the Bible teaches that it was the devil who put the idea of making clothes into their heads. This is a statement of Scripture in regard to which I am still willing to be counted orthodox.

James S. Denson remarks in a recent Lucifer apropos to Judge Phillips' absurdities, "If we are to have primeval intellects in high judicial places let us be perfectly frank about it; let us honestly say that we are going to savagedom for our judges." I wonder if Mr. Denson ever thought to inquire whither but to savagedom we shall go for our judges? What is an ideal judge? A person versed in law and willing to administer it. What is law? A rule of action imposed by a superior power. What is the power which laid down rules of action for us? The past. What is the character of the past relatively to the present? Barbarism. Law is the sum of those barbarous customs we have inherited; and that "primeval intellects" should declare them is as natural and proper as it can be.

I have lately read "A History of the Warfare of Science With Theology," by ex-President White of Cornell University. Less interesting in style than Lecky's "History of Rationalism," less outspoken and rough shod than Draper's "Conflict of Science and Religion," this book is very exhaustive, up to date. It traces progress "from creation to evolution," "from Genesis to geology," etc. In each case the author shows how theology hindered the new truth, then denounced it, then tried to compromise, and finally sneaked off, claiming to have known it all along! I think, however, that several new chapters will soon have to be added, as for example. "From Criminal Law to Degeneration Philosophy." The brute's and barbarian's instinct, when anything offends him is to pitch in and maul the offender. If very mad, he mauls him much; if less angry, less. This is the foundation of criminal law. (Proof, in the evolution of Roman and other codes. See Maine, Austin, Sir John Lubbock.) Theology, the product of a barbarous age, attributed a like disposition and method to its gods. The wickedest were eternally tormented in hell, the less wicked temporarily in purgatory. Both might get pardoned—not by doing better so much as by soft-soaping God, and "giving him the glory." Theology taught it was actually wicked to spare the rod. It held up God's example as proof that "punishment" was needed for two great purposes—warning to others and discipline to the evil doer. When men were barbarous, the former was held much more important than the latter. Theology insisted on it more; and thus made law more cruel. (See Lea, "Superstition and Force; Lecky, "Rationalism;" and President White's own book.) In the last century, the infidel Rousseau started, his followers Beccaria and Howard promoted, a movement in favor of mercy so strong that the "warning" part of "punishment" has been almost discontinued. Penologists profess to aim only at "reformation," which, they understand, cannot be effected by harsh methods; and they have induced most governments to modify the law accordingly, notwithstanding vehement protests from theology, which eventually crayfished and claimed the credit of what it had opposed, as usual. But now come Lombroso and his school with a demonstration that the criminal is born, not made—that he is a reversion to the brutal, barbarian, law-making theological type of man—that only the "occasional" kind of criminal can possibly be either "reformed" or "warned." Thus, instead of graduating punishment, the future must divide the great majority of these unfortunates into dangerous—to be taken care of—and, pretty harmless, to be let alone. Neither government nor theology, criminal law nor hell has any place in such an age. If these suggestions meet favor, I may try to add a programme for chapters, "From Marriage and Prostitution to Love," "From Property to Exchange in Freedom," "From Patriotism to Humanity," "From Education to Generation," "From Ethics to Savoir Faire," "From Authority to Anarchy."

An Instance of Extraordinary Hereditary Prolificness.

BY C. L.

"Vanentia ('Wiener Medizinische Wochenschrift,' Jan. 16, 1897,) cites an apparently authenticated case of a linen weaver's wife, forty years old, and married twenty years, who bore, in eleven pregnancies thirty-two children, as follows: In the first labor, quadruplets; in the second labor, triplets; in the third labor, quadruplets; in the fourth labor, twins; in the fifth labor, triplets; in the sixth labor, twins (still born); in the seventh labor, triplets; in the eighth labor, triplets; in the ninth labor, twins; in the tenth labor, triplets; and in the eleventh labor, triplets (two still born). Twenty-six of the infants were males, and six females. The father was one of twins, and the mother one of quadruplets of a mother who had borne thirty-eight children. The woman had been epileptic from her fifteenth year, the attacks recurring unchanged during successive pregnancies. The woman was in the third month of her twelfth pregnancy when this report was made."—New York "Medical Record" Feb. 20, 1897.

In commenting on the above, I will venture to inquire if this example of watering the stock issuing from a monogamic corporation, does not diminish the muscle and brain power of each child in proportion as the excess of parental energy to generate is spread out into thin layers, or great numbers. Is it not fully as detrimental to raising children whose bodies should be strong and sound, as is the over issuing of the stock of a state-formed, or financial corporation to the safety and well-being of society?

In this case, the mother has a transmissible disease, and both mother and father have a prolific heredity. It cannot be a source of happiness to these parents that they are raising such a large number of epileptic children. And, ten to one, that their spiritual advisers have instilled into them that it was a sin to thwart nature by contracepts. Their use would not be sinful, but a means of physical injury rangeing all the way from a slight change of the mucous tissues to well marked congestion. But is frequent pregnancy free from physical injuries? Now, any woman who has given birth to a child is competent to answer this simple question.

The question naturally arises: Along what lines should society move to secure a permanent rise in the physical power of each individual member who comes into it? From the viewpoint of a student in sociology, the shortest and best way out of the trend to degeneracy by all ignorant couples would be by carefully reading and profiting by the printed works on parentage and child-rearing that appear from time to time in such papers as Lucifer.

Should this or some similar course be pursued by the great body of our people, it is but fair to assume that a very much greater proportion of healthy and vigorous children would be reared than under the present reckless legalized method of sex-mating, and what is of a still greater good, such children would present increasingly developed sense and brain capacities of which the race has not hitherto had even the faintest glimpse.

The Population Question.

BY CYRUS W. COOLRIDGE.

At the risk of being called an advocate of the "Malthus superstition" I heartily endorse Mr. Harman's statement that we have no moral right "to bring children into the world when there is no reasonable prospect that they can be born well, or that they can properly be provided for after they are born." It may possibly be that under different economic conditions it would be right for every woman to have as many children as she may wish to have, but so long as the present conditions remain, we cannot be justified in increasing the number of sufferers.

I do not advise any one to accept the existing conditions as a matter of course and to submit to the yoke of iniquity. I say to every man and woman: Let us be rebels, let us do all we can to secure justice and freedom; but whether we can or cannot kill the monster of injustice, let us at any rate not add to the sum of the suffering and misery of the world. I admit that to teach that "the improvement of the working people can be accomplished by learning how to live on a dollar a week" is to utter "economic rot," but if a workingman can get no more than a dollar a week, I shall certainly not advise him to spend the whole of it in one day.

It is, perhaps, cruel to say to any one: "If you can provide for two children only, you have no right to have six," but which is the least evil? The man who cannot have as many children as he wishes, has, perhaps, a right to be dissatisfied with life. Poor fellow! let us pity him, but if he brings into existence a large number of children who have to suffer through no fault of their own, he deserves condemnation. An ignorant man can be excused; a man who is destitute of imagination and who cannot realize the consequences of his acts is, perhaps, not to blame. Of such a man we can say: "Father, forgive him, for he knows not what he does," but I cannot find an excuse for an enlightened man. If a blind man falls into a pit, it is not his fault, but a man with a good eye sight is himself to blame.

I know something of the suffering of poor children and I say distinctly that it is a crime to have children unless their lives can be made happy. I am a great lover of children; in fact I do not think there is a man in the world who loves babies more than I do, but I will not have a child unless I am able to properly provide for it. It is bad enough that I myself have to suffer, but I do not wish to make other people suffer. No matter what may be said against the "Malthus superstition," life, as it is, is full of wretchedness, and if we are to have children, let us be sure that the gift of life will not be a curse to them.

The Saviors of Mankind.

BY J. R. BUCHANAN.

The saviors of mankind are they in whom the divine elements of good and wisdom struggle to rise out of the dark sphere of selfish ignorance and misery, in which the race has ever lived, and to carry on evolution to that state of prosperity, happiness and wisdom, of which the race is capable, but which it has not attained, for the human, like the vegetable kingdom, germinates humbly, and struggles in the cold mud, long before it reaches its grandeur and beauty.

In that stated ignorance, it is abundantly supplied with self-conceit and quarrels with every teacher who recognizes its folly and tries to lead it in the path of progress.

Of its ancient leaders, Zoroaster, Moses, Confucius, Buddha, Chrishna, Ruetzalcoatl and Socrates, we need not speak at present, for the world is altogether too fond of dwelling on the past, to the neglect of the present and the future.

But there is one misunderstood leader in the past, the wisest of them all, who is but little known today because the powers of evil that have ruled mankind by mythical legends and by force, not satisfied with his murder by crucifixion, have half concealed and wholly blackened his fair countenance, by that singular compound of history, fiction, crazy absurdity and intense malignity, which is called the Bible, asserted to be the word of God, which has ruled the Caucasian race since it was first anonymously compiled and sent forth by the conquering power of the sword.

The church that held the sword, holds it but feebly today, and therefore there is a little freedom in the world struggling to enlarge its area. That church today knows not its origin ignores its own history, and assumes the name of Jesus Christ, to which it has no claim, for it has trampled upon all his teachings, which embodied the loveliest religion, the purest democracy and the most philanthropic heroism ever presented by any teacher.

The anonymous record, prepared by the Roman church in its secret conspiracy of the first and second centuries to conquer the world, represents him as a crazy fanatic, dealing alternately in non-resisting love and fierce threats, inspired by an infinite malignity. But the fountain of history, which I have opened with the key of science, has enabled me in "Primitive Christianity" to refute these libels and present as he was the great reformer who defied ecclesiasticism, knowing that death would be his fate, but over whom ecclesiasticism has triumphed by concealing his true history and putting in power everywhere the principles that he denounced in plain and emphatic language.

Jesus was justly called the savior because he presented so fully the principles of all reform, that the saviors who have since appeared have labored to present each some portion of that which he presented in its fullness—the law of universal love and justice.

All reformers have been assailed and slandered. He was maligned after his death by being presented as the mysterious creator of the world, its vengeful God who would send mankind to hell, though he did what he could to repress all superstitious reverence for his person, and all thoughts of cruelty and vengeance.

The principles of his life were illustrated by his martyred apostles; by Hypatia, whom the fierce monks of Alexandria tore into fragments; by Joan of Arc who saved France from English domination and was burned alive; by Bruno, the philosopher, whom the Papal church burned alive; by Voltaire in France, and Paine and Jefferson in America, and more recently by Shelley, Robert Owen, Chas. Fourier, Henry George and Moses Harman.

Harman knows no more of the higher world than did Buddha. Like Buddha he aims at terrestrial benevolence solely, and he has wisely chosen his specialty, for there is nothing more important than redeeming the procreation of humanity from the bondage of the despicable conceptions which have so long enslaved woman and debased the human race by debasing parentage as effectively as law and superstition can degrade it—conceptions introduced in the Bible by forgery.

The ideas to which Harman is devoted have long been germinating among free spirits, but have found in him the integrity and courage needed at the birth of all great movements.

Old Robert Owen on the fiftieth anniversary of the American Declaration of Independence issued his second Declaration of Independence at New Harmony, Ind., against the trinity of oppression, private property, religion and marriage. The religion that he assailed was the orthodox, which the Papal church substituted for the religion of Jesus; the marriage he assailed was the false conceptions established by that church, and the private property he assailed was the selfish monopoly which is now assailed by socialism.

Owen was blind as to the spirit world of the higher immortal life, but he met its evidences and promptly recognized them, and so will Harman when he gives that subject due attention, and if he would lead his readers in that direction he would greatly increase the value of his labors.

Next to the emancipation of woman ranks the emancipation of the land, which the followers of Henry George consider worth all other reforms. As I was the first to present that reform fully in 1847, I must claim that there are five other great reforms each of which is entitled to rank with land reform as indispensable to human salvation, but in the narrowness of the human mind each special reform must have its exclusive champion, and the group of champions may well be recognized as the saviors of humanity, who though struggling in battle now, may all be honored in the twentieth century.

REMARKS.

[This article has been held sometime in abeyance, partly because of the personal reference therein. A friend at my elbow suggests that such words of appreciation would be more timely and suitable after the earthly record of the writer of these lines has been fully completed. Such is my own view; but there is another side. The head that dictated the above article has seen near a score more years of life than has mine, and he wants to get in his work while it is yet day. It is part of Lucifer's religion not to play the censor and say what shall be eliminated from correspondence, and what shall stand. Liberty with responsibility for acts and words, is our motto, and so the article is printed as written.

If the venerable editor of the "Journal of Man," and author of many reformatory books, has shown, from historical data, in his latest work, "Primitive Christianity," that Jesus the Nazarene is a much maligned and misrepresented individual, and that he was really the wisest of all the ancient leaders and teachers, then the world of mankind will owe a debt of gratitude to Prof. Joseph Rodes Buchanan, such as it owes to but few men now living. The mythical "Galilean" has rested like a huge nightmare upon the thought-forces of the Caucasian race for some fifteen centuries,—barring all rational progress, filling Europe, and to a great extent the rest of the world, with hate, and causing rivers of blood and tears to flow. If Brother Buchanan has written the book that will exorcise this nightmare, this bloody demon, that has ridden the world so long, he will have done a work for which future generations will enroll his name high among the "Saviors of Mankind." His present address is San Jose, California. M. H.]

Legal Tender.—Reply to Questions.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

In Lucifer, No 648, I am directly asked a series of ten questions, upon each of which, if the subject of finance were open for unlimited discussion in your columns, a long paragraph would not be out of place. But as my answers to most of the questions can be gathered either from the original article on legal tender or from the following Lessons dealing with the financial question, I will assume that those questions were asked, not of me, but of the reader, in order to present to his mind, at the same time with my argument, other conflicting views. It seems to me eminently proper to present such conflicting views without waiting until the original argument has diverged to other considerations; and my reply to such suggestions will be brief, avoiding repetition.

The Constitution of the United States authorized Congress "to coin money." The coinage laws defined the term "dollar;" and changing the coinage laws correspondingly changes the meaning of the term. If Congress should now enact that there shall be a silver coin weighing one ounce, to be called a thaler, the people would freely select as the basis of transfer, either the dollar or the thaler, neither of which would be legal tender for the payments of debts contracted to be paid in the other. There need be no objection to the free coinage of thalers. There would be no wrong, robbery, crime or suffering, and there would be no disturbance in financial transactions. The question of the forceful collection of debts in either would remain; and that question I shall briefly consider when it is reached in the Lessons.

[So long as 412 grains of silver—coined or stamped,—is called a dollar and does not have to be redeemed in gold or anything else, I maintain it is the real standard of value in the United States. It was first on the ground and has not yet been dislodged, notwithstanding the schemes of robbers to degrade it to the condition of "token money," in order that they may the more easily rob the people by making the scarcer metal the only standard of value. But this whole question of "legal tender"—including the "fiat" scheme of governmentalists, is such a bewildering labyrinth that, in my opinion, the best way out is to say to government authority—"Hands off!" Then let the people issue and manage their own currency, as they do, or should do, all their personal affairs. M. H.]

Lucifer's Needs.

A few prompt responses to our request for co-operative work in Lucifer's behalf, printed in last issue, have been received, but not enough to supply the need. As spring advances the tendency is to forget the printer and publisher, and if he says nothing it will be inferred that he is getting on all right, and that it matters little whether renewals are promptly sent in or not.

Our readers know that it is not Lucifer's habit to be perpetually asking for money, but reform papers, especially those located in large cities, cannot be run without money, and knowing so well that the spring and early summer months are by far the hardest seasons of the year to make ends meet we think it right, proper and even necessary to remind our friends, everywhere, of this very stubborn fact. Sending out statements of account is expensive in time and money. Will the reader of this line kindly consider it as addressed to her or to him, and, if possible, send us a little co-operative aid, either on subscription to Lucifer, or for copies of the magazine, or for other useful reformatory literature advertised by us?

Is Stumbling Better than Good Walking?

BY E. C. WALKER.

In his article in No. 645 Mr. Chavannes starts out with the statement that he will not answer my preceding communication. He has kept his word. But in the attempt to answer my arguments he has again put himself hopelessly on the wrong side. To illustrate: In his second paragraph he says: "I was a firm believer that to be right—coherent—was the true way to happiness." That "right" of Mr. Chavannes' is an ethical right, and I have disclaimed, distinctly, any intention to discuss ethics here. I have also said (641) that I do "not believe that logic is necessarily the equivalent of truth. It fact, they have no immediate necessary relation." I said: "What I maintain is that coherence of thought is helpful in all the relations of life, that it hastens the advance in intelligence of the man and of the race, and is therefore one of the greatest aids in [securing] happiness." Mr. Chavannes fails to distinguish between logic and coherence. The man who can readily perceive contradictions in thought or action, or between thoughts and actions, can more easily arrive at the truth than can the man whose mind is too incoherent in its processes to sense those contradictions. The perception of truth, that is, knowledge of the real properties and relations of things, is promotive of happiness. The man who knows what animals and plants are poisonous is safer when he travels through a tropical jungle than is the man who is lacking in this knowledge. Coherence enables us to perceive truth. Truth (knowledge) helps us to avoid mistakes in the pursuit of happiness. Therefore, coherence is conducive to happiness.

Mr. Chavannes quotes against me Mr. Denson, who said: "We must reason from facts to principles, and not from principles to facts." Mr. Denson is wholly right. From the facts of human experience—and their number is legion—we deduce the principle that when men act contrary to their convictions of right the aggregate of their suffering is greater than the aggregate of their happiness. To illustrate his contention that most advance is to be made by inducing people to act before they have learned to think, Mr. Chavannes points to the question of sex reform. He could not have chosen an example more unfortunate for his purpose. He says: "I believe I am within the limit when I say that nine-tenths of the women who at times take the control of their sexual conduct into their own hands, do so in opposition to their religious or social beliefs." And he should have added that nine-tenths of those who thus act freely, in defiance of their convictions, endure a hell upon earth. There is the great army of prostitutes to be set off in this class at once, with very few exceptions. We need not dwell upon their miseries and their ghastly fate at last. Then we have the multitude of women who yield to their desires one or more times but who escape the prying eyes of Mrs. Grundy and so do not lose their respectability. Against their temporary physical enjoyment of love is to be set their remorse when separated from their lovers, and often when with them, their fear of detection, their constant regrets in after life. From the ranks of these women come those who play their lovers false when their passion has cooled, who bring the men who have trusted them into court on charges of rape, seduction, and the like. These are the women who are betrayed, who are scorned by the men with whom they have associated, who are left with babes which they dare not own. These are the women who furnish so large a contingent of the mighty army that goes to the abortionist for relief. Professor Clifford said that "many a remorseful tyrant has atoned for the levities of his youth by the persecution of heretics in his old age." So, many a woman who in her youth acted without thinking atones for what she deems her grievous sin by her vindictively cruel treatment of girls and women who follow in her footsteps. Every day brings to our notice terrible tragedies that result from acting in sex matters without thinking, from acting in disregard of the sense of right of the participants. Disaster almost inevitably attends incoherence of this kind. Superstition bears a cutting, brine-soaked lash. Her votaries will break away temporarily, but afterward they are their own and their fellow-sufferers' merciless flagellants.

No; sex liberty in practice must be based on sex liberty in conviction or there will result immensely more misery than happiness. It is not I but the lessons of human history that formulate this principle. The necessity of coherence is insistently proclaimed by the facts. The reasoning is inductive. So far is it from being true that the cause of social freedom is assisted by the inconsistent action of conservatives, that the fact is that social freedom has no greater obstacle in its path. Everywhere the radical meets the argument from experience. He is told—and with truth—that lax conduct leads to unhappiness. Everywhere he is shown the evils that have accompanied departure from the rules of conventional society. The incoherence of passion-led men and women compels him to consume time and energy in showing that social freedom is something vastly different from the remorse-inspiring and catastrophe-breeding acts of social conservatives.

So dangerous is it for radical men and women to consort with conservative women and men that prudent social reformers hold themselves aloof from conservatives in spite of the attractions that would otherwise draw them together. They realize that the menaces are too many, too imminent, and too serious to be lightly defied. The threatened terrors are legal, physical, pecuniary and social. The conservative lover can never be trusted. Scarcely a day passes that the newspapers do not furnish us evidence in support of this proposition. The betrayal of the swindler McLaughlin by Daisy Hampton is one of the most recent instances in point here in New York. No one can tell from one hour to another what a person with an uneasy conscience will do. And almost invariably an orthodox lover will have more influence for reaction than the radical lover will have for progress, for back of the orthodox man or woman are all the tremendously powerful forces of inertia, prejudice, fear and interest.

Relation of Economics to Sex Reform.

DEAR MR. HARMAN: I had no idea of being all those bad things you accuse me of, when I only wanted to make a protest against your rebuke to a mother who had, in my opinion, done a good thing.

My article in print does sound somewhat needlessly harsh I admit, and I am willing to apologize, but it seems necessary nowadays to say things sharply or they are not noticed at all. Everyone is so busy with the importance of what he has to say no one listens to what anyone else has to say. I very often say wise things in a quiet, polite manner and no one pays any attention, so I am driven to believe the only way to make an impression is to jump onto one's victim with both feet, hold him down and stick pins into him, or do something of that kind to be sure of a hearing.

Perhaps I made a mistake in assuming that you needed so vigorous a reminder, but force of habit is strong. If my apology is accepted I wish to add a few words more.

There can be no doubt in the minds of those who know me of my friendship for Lucifer, and I heartily join you and always have been with you in preaching the doctrine of free and voluntary motherhood. Just as I believe it is wrong to force any one to pay taxes or obey laws, I believe it is wrong to force women to become mothers; but all honor to the person who freely donates labor and money to a work that benefits the community; all honor to the person who obeys the laws of equal liberty, and all honor to every mother who has brought into the world a "fine family of healthy, loving, happy children." The shame and disgrace and wrong lie in the robber system that shuts out so many children from their rightful "places at nature's table." (I know that is a favorite phrase with Malthusians and that is why I accused you of being one.)

It is a strange thing that after our fifty years of inventive development that has increased the power of production a thousand fold there are fewer and fewer "places at nature's table."

There are plenty of reasons why women should not bear more children than they can willingly and gladly welcome, but the weakest and most flimsy, in my opinion, is that there is any real scarcity of the "honey that is being stored" or a limit to the "production or storing of food."

I am not even sure that the over production of children always results in "inferior quality." I have no statistics, but I have no reason to believe that the children born fifty and sixty years ago were inferior in physical, moral or intellectual endowments to the "fewer and better children" of today, or that the brightest and best of that day were from the small families.

The men and women who have achieved great things who have made epochs, moved the world and sent their names thundering down the ages have not invariably come from small families reared in comfort and plenty, not even generally so.

With all our studying and teaching, whether it has its influence or not, some power is working out a decrease in the members of families, and we have little need to worry about the advent of too many children, especially about a woman who has borne a family of "fine, loving, happy children."

You see, it makes me feel uncomfortable to see you hitting heads so recklessly wherever you see one. When your club comes down on the head of an intelligent reader of Lucifer who is on the right track to give her family the proper education and direction, I don't feel very safe myself and I wonder if any will escape.

LILLIE D. WHITE.

REMARKS:

I have room for but a few words. There is really little to be said, as I view the matter. I gladly accept the assurance that Mrs. White agrees with Lucifer in its central thought or contention. As to the differences in view as to what is most needful to be done first, it is not probable that continued discussion will bring our correspondent and myself much nearer together. To my thinking, reason and observation teach that, other things being equal, a few children can be better born and better cared for than can a dozen or a score from the same mother. See the article entitled "An Instance of Extraordinary Hereditary Prolificness," printed in this issue of Lucifer, written by a distinguished physician of this city. My reading and observation show that the "men and women who have achieved great things" were not, as a rule, members of large families, and when they were, the exception could be accounted for without violation of the rule already mentioned.

For instance, John and Charles Wesley were members of a large family of children—but they were among the first of the lot. Then, their mother was the wife of an English clergyman, sufficiently wealthy to give her sons a collegiate education. Is there any ground of comparison between the case of this mother and that of the mothers who add swarms of children to the census in the large cities or in the manufacturing towns, of this country and Europe?

It may be all right to speak with contempt, as Mrs. White does, of the argument drawn from the hive of bees, but I would simply ask, whether the storing of honey in the hive of the millionaires is providing for the wants of children in the homes of the poor. And whether adding to the number of pliant tools of the plutocrats, by the continued fertility of tired-out and hopelessly enslaved mothers, is going to take the honey from the hives of the rich and put it into those of the poor.

Finally, I am not conscious of "hitting heads recklessly." On the contrary I avoid personalities as much as possible. In the case of the parent who said he, (not "she") had a "fine growth of children, loving and fairly happy without corresponding growth of income," I simply suggested that when woman's "sense of responsibility to the unborn is fully awakened he will not bring children into the world until conditions are provided that will give to each a place at nature's table." If this be treason, let those who do not believe in prudence and forethought, make the most of it.

As Mr. Coolridge says, in another place, "let us all be rebels," but let us rebel wisely. Let us not help to perpetuate the present robber system by an unlimited and hap-hazard production of children. That such production will help the plutocratic robbers rather than their enslaved victims, will, as I think, be admitted by all reflecting minds when the matter is properly considered.

M. HARMAN.

Nature is always nude, innocence is always nude; at every violation of virtue, at every stain of innocence, man throws a new veil over the statue of love.—Mantegazza.

Fiat Money.

BY H. H. HUTCHESON.

To let Henry M. Parkhurst's "Sociologic Lessons" No. XXXI and XXXII go to the readers of Lucifer uncriticised, to farther mislead some of them in regard to the gold basis fallacy, would be, as I think, a sin of omission on my part.

Mr. Parkhurst says, "Fiat money, founded not upon redeemability at the pleasure of the holder but upon government authority, when the government assumes no responsibility for its redemption, at once takes the position of confederate currency."

Here let me repeat what I have said in the columns of Lucifer before, i. e. that nothing is money that is not fiat money. I challenge Mr. Parkhurst to name a dollar that is not a fiat dollar. He may assume that a certain amount of gold is a dollar. Not so. No amount of gold is a dollar unless it has the government fiat on it. If I owe Mr. Parkhurst five dollars and tender him a chunk of gold weighing a pound, he need not accept it as payment because it is not a legal tender; but if I tender him a few grains of gold or silver or a little piece of paper with the government fiat on it saying it is five dollars he is bound to accept it as payment. It may be claimed that no one would refuse a pound of gold for a five dollar debt. Granted; neither would any sane person refuse a corner lot in Wall street, New York, in payment of five dollars, but the lot is not five dollars on that account; no more is a pound of gold.

Mr. Parkhurst likens confederate currency to fiat money, whereas the confederacy never really existed, and never claimed its notes to be fiat money, or money at all, but simply promises to pay money sometime. Fiat money is real money, not a promise to pay; and is not redeemable in money.

In lesson No. XXXI I notice this: "All that is left for him to do is to use the notes in the purchase of other articles, or in payment for services." That is all the use he could make of its equivalent in gold. Money, be it coined on gold, silver, paper or copper, is useless for any other purpose. I have never yet heard of anybody being fool enough to want a real fiat dollar redeemed with another dollar. Would any man be silly enough to work all day for a dollar if he knew that all the use he could make of it would be to trade it for another dollar?

In lesson No. XXXII Mr. Parkhurst says about the same thing in these words. "Fiat money has no value in itself, and can only be exchanged for articles or services which have value." In this I agree with him. No money has any other value. True, the gold on which a dollar is coined has intrinsic value, for use in art or science, but to make such use of it destroys it as money, and to make it into money takes it out of use for any other purpose.

I hope Brother Parkhurst will apologize for those last two lessons, XXXI and XXXII.

[The right solution of the financial problem is closely connected with the right solution of other social questions, including race-emancipation from sex-slavery, but the smallness of our space and the necessity of concentration on one or a few lines of work, compel us to ask our friends to condense their remarks on finance to as small limits as possible. An exhaustive discussion of this and of economic questions nearly related to it, would crowd out completely investigations into and discussions of problems the right understanding of which Lucifer's conductors consider of paramount importance. M. H.]

Sociologic Lesson. No XXXIII.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

REDEMPTION RESERVE. While it is absolutely necessary that a currency consisting of notes shall be redeemable in gold, that is to say in what has universal value, it does not follow that the government which promises to redeem it shall keep on hand any specific amount with which to redeem it. The surplus of $100,000,000, nominally as a basis for the government notes, but which could not be used for their redemption, really furnished no basis whatever. This reserve, after lying idle for many years, subject to depredation, was at last nearly exhausted without affecting the currency supposed to be based upon it. The real and the only basis was the knowledge or the belief that the government would make provision in due time so as not to suffer default. So long as the government is able to borrow gold on a day's notice, it needs only to keep on hand a supply of gold sufficient to last a day. Under existing conditions the supply of gold necessary to float our national currency is excessively small; for gold is only wanted to pay for a surplus of purchases abroad beyond what our exports will pay for, and gold is one of the products and exports of this country.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXI.

In the days and nights that followed Imelda had every opportunity for studying this sister pair, with whom the manner of her becoming acquainted was so different from that she had pictured. The first week was a trying time. Fever flushed the cheeks of the injured girl, tossed her head upon her pillow, and in her delirium she spoke of many things that caused Imelda's face alternately to pale and glow.

If any reliance could be placed upon those wild utterances, "storm tossed" would be the right appellation to be applied to the life she had been leading. In her troubled dreams she was living in an atmosphere that was strange to the much tried sister. At intervals she would recognize Imelda for a few moments; then there was a subdued light in the feverish eyes, a nervous twitching about the lips. Her hand would come creeping in a hesitating way, groping for that of her sister. Imelda thought she understood. Gently pressing the groping hand she would lay her cheek to that of the suffering girl and whisper,

"It is all right, Cora, never mind." Sometimes in lucid intervals, tears would force their way from under the closed eyelids and roll down the faded cheek. Imelda would gently wipe them away and kiss the parched lips. But invariably the next moment wild fancies would hold sway and she would talk of things the patient sister could not understand.

Edith and Hilda were of the greatest help to Imelda. They would insist upon relieving her that she might refresh her tired frame with hours of balmy sleep, and also insisted that she should occasionally take a walk in the evening or morning air. Hilda more particularly proved herself a valuable assistant. The soft magnetic touch of her hand seemed to give ease to Cora in her most restless moments.

For more than a week her life hung in the balance. But her strong youth conquered, and after the ninth day reason returned to its throne. The gash upon the white forehead would be a disfigurement for life. Happily the prevailing fashion of wearing bangs would almost completely hide the disfiguring mark. The cruel wound was yet far from being healed, but the danger was past. It now only required time for her to gather strength. Already she could sit daily for a few hours in a comfortable arm chair and enjoy the sweet pure air at the open window.

The Wallace sisters had positively refused to listen to any arrangement for removal of the patient. "She will remain," they had said, "until quite well." And here she still was, after two weeks had passed. A marked change had come over her. Imelda saw she was no longer the reckless, daring Cora of old. A spirit of refinement rested on the white brow, and shone in the no longer defiant eyes. There was a story in the pained lines of the decidedly pretty face. The loss of blood, the ravages of fever, and the pain of the broken arm had robbed her of every vestige of color. The ugly gash upon the white forehead had now healed enough to remove the bandage, and only a narrow strip of court plaster was needed to cover the still festering edges.

As she was somewhat of the same build and size as Hilda, that maiden had robed her in a pretty pink tea gown with a white silken front, trimmed at the neck and wrists with a soft fall of rich lace, a white silk cord encircled the waist. The heavy light brown hair had been combed school girl fashion, and hung in two plain braids over either shoulder. With the front hair Hilda had gone to some extra trouble to have it look nice. It was a mass of fluffy, curling ringlets, only at one end peeped the court plaster, merely indicating what was hidden. With that look of sadness, that was so new to the elder sister, and which softened every line of her face, Cora was far more than merely pretty.

As yet the time that intervened since the sisters had seen each other last had not been touched upon. Both seemed to avoid it as if by mutual consent. Today Cora lay back in her chair, her gaze fixed intently upon the outside of the window, but it was doubtful if she saw what was transpiring there. Imelda had been reading, now she also was resting. The book lay in her lap while she too permitted her gaze to wander. After a time, however, she recalled her wandering looks and directed them upon the face opposite her, and in doing so she saw that two pearly drops had stolen from beneath the half-closed eyelids and were slowly trickling down the white cheeks. Imelda noislessly sank on her knees at her side, and taking the well hand of the girl in both of hers, she laid it against her cheek.

"What is it, Cora?" she asked gently. "Can you not trust your sister and tell her all?" But as if the words had loosened the flood gates of her soul the tears gushed forth in torrents from the hazel eyes; the white teeth sank deep into the quivering lips, as if to quell the sobs that broke from them. Drawing her hand away from Imelda she covered her face while she sobbed as if her heart would break. For a while Imelda did not speak, but permitted the storm to spend its strength, knowing full well she would feel all the better for it. When she had become more calm Imelda passed her arm about her waist and leaned her head against Cora's arm.

"Won't you tell me?" she again pleaded. Again the lips quivered and the tears flowed.

"Oh, Melda, Melda, how can I? You in your purity cannot understand. If I tell you all you will withdraw your clean immaculate hands from me and—— Well, what matters it? I have chosen my path and no doubt can continue to walk in it. When a girl once steps aside from the straight way it is not supposed that she should ever wish to return. That circumstances rather than desire could send a woman on the downward course to ruin is not considered at all probable. I may have been wayward and willful in the past. I know I was not good and gentle and dutiful as you were. But I was not possessed of the same strong nature, and if I have done wrong, believe me, Imelda, I have also suffered."

There was bitter pain in the words that seemed to dry the hot tears. Her mood was changing. She was at this instant more like the Cora of old than she had been since the accident. Imelda did not like it; she feared it might lead her back to the old defiance, but she hoped not. It should not, if womanly ingenuity could prevent it. So she determined not to notice the underlying bitterness. She pressed the unhappy girl's hand and said:

"Don't be too sure of so easily ridding yourself of your sister. I do not intend to lose you again. Do you think it was for the mere pleasure of the thing that I have been watching with you night and day for the past two weeks? Oh, no! Since I have found you I intend to keep you with me. An only sister is not lightly lost sight of."

This last caused Cora quickly to turn her head.

"An only sister? What about——little Nellie?"

A sharp pang pierced Imelda's heart. The question showed her that Cora did not know of the changes that had taken place. But as she hesitated Cora seemed to understand.

"Is little Nellie dead?" she asked.

"Yes!" softly answered Imelda's voice, as her arm tightened about Cora's waist. "Little Nellie is sleeping in our mother's arms."

Imelda felt the tremor in the weakened frame, but no answer came from the pallid lips. But when she looked up she observed the tears again stealing from beneath the closed lids.

"Dead! dead!" she whispered, "and I was not there. Maybe it was better so. If she had known all that had taken place in my life it would only have added another bitter drop to her already overflowing cup. But you, Imelda! What are you doing here so many miles from our western home? How came you here?"

"Do you remember Alice Day, who used to work at the store where we were both employed?"

"Yes."

"Well, you also remember that it is long since she is no longer Alice Day but Mrs. Lawrence Westcot. Lawrence Westcot's home is in Harrisburg and I have the care of her children, two sweet little girls."

"Here in Harrisburg?"

"Yes, here. And just here, I may as well tell you of another circumstance. On the day which came so near being your last our old time friend with her two little girls and myself were out driving in her carriage when through the throwing of a stone our horses took fright, and like mad they dashed through the streets and—— Well, do you understand the rest? I was in the vehicle that caused you a broken arm and an almost broken head." Cora smiled sadly.

"A pity it was not wholly broken,"—for which she was reproved by Imelda.

"Don't let me hear such words again. I will not listen; but first tell me why you should use them and then let me judge."

"Let you judge,"—fell in bitterest accents from Cora's lips. "Chaste, honest, truthful, will you be able to judge me?"

"I hope so, and as I hope that I am all that you say, you must not forget to add 'just.' That is another attribute to which I aspire. Now trust me, little sister, and ease that aching heart. You will feel better when it is all over, I am very sure." So at last Cora gathered up courage and began the confession that in the last few days so often had hovered upon her lips.

VARIOUS VOICES.

H. T.:—Herewith find enclosed one dollar on subscription to Lucifer. Our young president handed it to me to be applied to that purpose. You need not change the name on the tab,—it will be read by all the inside circle, just the same.

Our Libertarian Association Limited has already reached the practical stage.

L. H. Piehn, Nora Springs, Iowa:—I am very glad you are awake on the medical delusion which causes the blood-poisoning of our dear children and holds power over our free schools. It is the worst kind of barbarism. Let us bring light to the world I am in sympathy with your grand work. I have been a church slave all my life, but got awake when my children were murdered by vaccination. Now I am going for victory.

J. C. Barnes, Hindsboro, Ill.:—Inclosed please find one dollar for which credit your account against me for Lucifer. I am more pleased with Lucifer as I read more of it. The more anarchy you put in it the better I like it. I have lived a life of anarchy for forty years with hindering environment and know that it would work, even if immediately adopted. How much better when more are educated to mind their own business, as your paper is doing. Let every one do as he pleases, limited only by the equal freedom of every person.

Col. H. Winchester, Lower Lake, Cal.:—You have my most sincere thanks for your kindness to an old man in sending him Lucifer, with which I am fully in accord. I know of many instances of the damnable outrage and wrong done to the pure and virtuous, and if I could see—I have only about three inches of sight—and if my hand was not paralyzed I would write them

Elizabeth H. Russell, Cleveland, O.:—Inclosed find one dollar and name of new subscriber. I see by reading Lucifer No. 648, that you are getting some hard slaps in the face from one of your critics, Mrs. Lillie D. White. I have re-read the offending article in No. 640. If my memory serves me right Mrs. White worked on the same lines herself, while she was editing Lucifer, some years back, advocating woman's moral responsibility in the production of offspring. And that is all you contend for; that if woman were free she could then decide the number of children she would bring into the world, whereas in marriage she has no say in the matter, being subject unto her husband. I do not like the spirit of the criticism at all. She has given a wrong meaning to your words.

"Firebrand Group," Portland, Oregon:—In the Lucifer of Feb. 24, we notice a complimentary notice of the "Firebrand," but we wish to correct some mistaken statements therein.

Owing to the postal laws we were compelled to fix a price, so the old price of fifty cents per year was re-established. The paper is an exponent of Anarchist-Communism (but accepts articles on all subjects), advocating voluntary co-operation, but has not devoted itself to the advocacy of "co-operative banking," or other palliative, but has boldly demanded unqualified liberty.

We gladly grasp the outstretched hand of fellowship, hoping that the fraternal union of Lucifer and the "Firebrand" may last as long as the two papers exist.

[Always glad to have mistakes corrected—if such should be made in Lucifer's columns. The statement in regard to "Subscription Voluntary," was taken, in substance, from the editorial of the "Firebrand" itself. Am glad to know our contemporary demands "unqualified liberty." In a private letter Friend Addis asks, "when did you ever send us anything for publication that did not appear?" alluding to a certain reply to "Critics" that had appeared in Lucifer of March 3. In answer I would say that the reference in the last line of said reply was not aimed at the "Firebrand." It was an eastern, not a western, contemporary that had refused me the privilege of space for reply. Lucifer invites truthful, fair, honest criticism, even though somewhat "rough shod," to quote the language of Friend Addis, but misrepresentation whether in editorial or correspondence columns is not pleasant. In his summing up of the matter in the "Firebrand" of March 7, I think Mr. Walker states the case correctly, so far as himself and Lucifer are concerned, and as it seems so very hard to get our radical friends to understand Lucifer's position in regard to the much discussed "Boston tragedy," Mr. Walker's reply to the "Firebrand" and its correspondents will probably appear in our next issue. THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. I., No. 12. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, MARCH 31, E. M. 297. [C. E. 1897.] WHOLE No. 652.

The First Teacher.

Mystery of all the ages,
Angel of power and flame!
Not dimmed is thy wings' burnished splendor,
Nor drooping thy spirit in shame,
First of the princes celestial,
Nearest the heart of the light!
At last break the centuries' silence,
At last speak thy story aright.

"Only through knowledge of evil
Comes man to knowledge of right;
Only in struggles of blindness
Was evolved, through the aeons, his sight.
Ever falling, yet still rising higher,
Soul comes to her kingdom again;
This is eternity's secret,
This is my mission to men."

More Oracular Utterances of the "New Priesthood."

BY E. C. WALKER.

In No. 644 of Lucifer I spoke of "The Medical Priesthood and Woman's 'Duty,'" taking as my texts some remarkable assertions made by certain physicians writing for the "Medical World" upon the subject of the prevention of conception. In subsequent numbers of that publication the discussion has been continued, and it is my purpose to quote here and briefly comment on a few characteristic deliverances of the priests of the Church of Medicine and Surgery, now rapidly rising to supreme power in this country. The excerpts are from the latest issue of the periodical named.

Dr. A. W. Mitchell tells of six cases of miscarriage among his married patients. Five of the cases were self-induced, he thinks, and yet he is opposed to making general the knowledge of contraceptics. "All were young or in the prime of life; two were recently married and did not want a baby until they had been married a year or two at least. Three of them had two children each already and did not want any more. None was wealthy, but all were healthy." It seems to me that the reasons his patients did not desire children at that time were sufficient, and that a good contraceptic would have been a boon to all of them. Does Dr. Mitchell think miscarriage preferable to prevention? It brings more custom to his shop, of course. But a doctor should not be too mercenary. However, Dr. Mitchell's incoherence is ample to account for the position he takes, without imputing excessive avariciousness to him. In one part of a paragraph he says that the women he mentioned as having induced miscarriage would not bother with any contraceptic, "and so with the hordes of people like them," which is pure assumption, of course, and in another part of the paragraph, when he is urging doctors to "go slow" in advising the use of contraceptics, he says: "What a picnic the boys and girls would have if the girls only knew that by a very simple device they were just as safe from public disgrace as the boys!" What are the grounds for Dr. Mitchell's assumption that the girls would be so much more sensible, practically, than the married women? Why does he think the unmarried would use contraceptics while the married would prefer abortion? Dr. Mitchell is absurd, and his absurdity has its birth in the fear of the fossil that the boys and girls would have a "picnic" and nobody be hurt! Like Mark Twain's Puritans, Dr. Mitchell has an instinctive hatred of pleasure, to balance his love of pain—when others are the sufferers. This will be still more apparent when I come to another part of his article, as I shall before I finish.

"H." speaks of "one of nature's grandest laws" and of "one of the Almighty's commands," evidently laboring under the delusion that there are two supreme authorities in the universe. It is needless to say that the writer knows nothing whatever about an "Almighty" person or his commands, while what we call "nature's laws" are purely subjective. Talking about "rending asunder established laws," is nonsense. To prevent the undesired meeting of the ova and the spermatozoa is no more violative of "law" than is the saving of a somnambulist who is about to fall from the roof of a building in "obedience to the law" of gravitation. "H" says: "Use what means you may, and the wife forfeits her conjugal rights." What "conjugal rights" does the wife forfeit, and how does she, more than her husband, forfeit these unknown "conjugal rights" by the use of contraceptics? This opponent of prevention continues:

> The argument that many wives are urged to submit at too frequent intervals to the sexual embrace by over-exacting husbands is not our responsibility, and is no excuse for our advising any means which tend to thwart nature, promulgate vicious sexual relations, and thus abet an evil so fatal to healthy moral, mental and physiological life.

Evidently, the argument mentioned is not the doctors' responsibility—in fact. I do not see how one man's argument could be another man's responsibility, but taking "H" as he meant and not as he said, and it is to be maintained that the doctors are responsible for the fact that many wives are compelled to submit to undesired associations and pregnancies, and this is especially true when the doctor has such a fear of encouraging "vicious sexual relations" that he refuses to advise his patient to use a contraceptic or leave her husband's bed, when he (the doctor) knows that another child will mean the serious impairment of her health and perhaps her death. Did it ever occur to "H" that he "thwarts nature" when he gives an antidote to a poison taken into the system, accidentally or otherwise? Once more:

> The late Professor Goodell once said: "Show me a house without children, and, ten to one, you show me an abode dreary in its loneliness, disturbed by jealousy or estrangement, distasteful from wayward caprice or from unlovable eccentricity."

What has this to do with the question at issue? What friend of prevention has argued for childless homes? It has been contended only that the number of children should be kept within reasonable limits, that men and women for any reason unfitted for parenthood should not bring children into the world but need not because of this sacrifice be compelled to sacrifice also all the other joys of love, and that the woman should have the casting vote in regard to her own possible motherhood.

Dr. D. D. Rose talks quite sensibly on the subject (I have copied one of his paragraphs for Lucifer), saying that "the whole matter ought to be under the control of the women," and he describes his favorite method of prevention, but he has all the priest's horror of the laity possessing any information for themselves. Listen to him: "One great difficulty in the matter is, that if a physician teaches a method to some one who ought to know, she cannot refrain from telling her neighbors what the doctor said, and it takes only about two weeks for a whole state to know." That the doctors should wish to guard trade secrets is natural, but it is to the interest of the people that they be made known. If "the whole matter ought to be under the control of the women," the doctors should be required to give up their monopoly of knowledge, for the women cannot control their own bodies while they remain in ignorance of the methods of prevention, each depending upon the caprice of some physician, who takes it upon himself to say under what circumstances, if under any, she may refuse to become a mother.

Another anonymous contributor, who says he believes that if "there is any harmless and effective preventive it should be made known to the medical profession, to be used by physicians in any and all cases where the woman from any cause cannot give birth to a living child," declares that "the profession alone should know the means by which it [prevention] is accomplished." This doctor must think that women are indeed fools if they do not know the means by which prevention is secured in their individual cases, when advised by their doctors. Certainly, the means "X" recommends must be known to the women affected thereby. But the most startling thought suggested by the assertions and claims of these doctors is that if they could have their way the New Priesthood would absolutely control the population of any and every country. No woman could refuse to become a mother except by permission of a physician, which means that the increase or decrease of the number of inhabitants of every state would depend upon the decree of the men of medicine. In their hands would repose the fate of the race; the genus homo would continue to exist or it would perish within two generations, just as they thought best. Verily, these gentlemen are too ambitious; the theological priest, in the days of his greatest power, never aspired to the universal, all-inclusive dominion to which the medical priest coolly assumes himself to be entitled.

Still another anonymous writer declaims against the lending of medical journals to the laity. His chief grievance seems to be that the layman reads in the medical paper of some improved treatment of a given disease and then finds fault with Dr. Antiquated for clinging to an old method. It is too bad that the growing intelligence of the raw material upon which they work should compel doctors to try to keep up with the procession. I wonder if the lawyers, electricians, steam engineers, pattern designers, and the other specialists are worrying about the reading of their periodicals by the non-professionals?

To return for a moment to Dr. Mitchell: He contemptuously derides the use of contraceptics, and says that only old age or castration will prevent the practice of abortion, presumably in the case of any particular couple, for, like all the other doctors whose arguments I have noticed in this article, he horribly mangles the English language. This is Dr. Mitchell's concluding recommendation:

> Why not take an open stand for castration as a legal way of disposing of a class of cases that might be termed vicious, physically or mentally?

"A class of cases that might be termed vicious"! This is delightfully indefinite. This "class" might be made to include all who, because of a lack of knowledge of contraceptics, induce miscarriage, and I am of the opinion that Dr. Mitchell meant to be so understood, as my earlier quotations from his article would seem to imply. The double proposition amounts to this: Do not let women know how to prevent undesired conception, and then castrate their husbands or lovers if they induce abortion or if their children are not up to the standard set by the legal gentlemen and medicos. That is to say, the doctors will keep the women in ignorance and then mutilate the men, for, as you will readily see, it is to their interest to pursue this course of action. When women are intelligent and have in their own hands the means of prevention the revenues of the medical knowledge-suppressors will be reduced, but if the women are kept in a state of ignorant dependence on the physicians the state will pay the doctors for "disposing" "in a legal way" of the offending men. It is a lovely scheme, eminently characteristic and well worthy of the "ethics" of the New Priesthood. It remains to be seen whether the intelligent and humane physicians of the world can purge their profession of this scoundrelly element of ignorance perpetuators and manglers of the unfortunate.

Have we not had enough and to spare of priesthoods? Is it not time for the people to think and act for themselves? A few of us have come to the conclusion that the religious priest has no authority to command; that he may guide only. A still smaller number affirm that the functions of the medical priest are advisory only, never rightfully mandatory. The world woefully needs a Declaration of Independence of the New Priesthood.

The Battle is On.

BY N. C. MATHERS.

We have a Freethought library here, Wichita, Kansas, and what purports to be a freethought society. But in my humble opinion the name is too broad for the society. "Infidel society" would have been much more appropriate.

That editorial, "A Dissenting Voice" in the January number of the "Freethought Magazine," relating to S. P. Putnam and May Collins, has caused our bravest and most liberal members to hoist the white flag and surrender to "Mrs. Grundy."

My wife and I had expected to do some missionary work here for Lucifer and the noble cause it advocates, in the emancipation of woman and the elevation of the race. But our prospect of success in that line is not encouraging, since the so-called "Freethought Magazine" has surrendered its guns and its ammunition to our orthodox enemy.

We have quite a large number of Infidels here, but only a few Freethinkers, if I understand the meaning of the terms. Or at least if they are Freethinkers they have a string tied to their thoughts, that will allow them to go only so far. They cower and cringe at the possibility of being mistaken for "free-lovers." Many "Freethinkers" are not free to investigate very far outside of theological questions. They draw the line and say, "Halt!" when it comes to analyzing some of the social questions that orthodoxy has established and declared to be divine. They denounce free-love in the same bitter terms, and with as little show of reason as the most zealous adherent of the church denounces infidelity. And those very "Freethinkers" who denounce it, do so from absolute ignorance of what it teaches, and of the proposed results of its final accomplishment. They know no more about the aims and objects of the free-love philosophy than a Salvation Army captain knows about evolution or materialism. They are treading on the same ground that all other persecutors have trod in the past ages.

Bruno was burned for stating advanced ideas that have since proved to be correct. Ignorance yet contests every step forward. The church has not got a monopoly on ostracism for opinion's sake. People may yet learn that it is just as important for the human race to breed good children, as to breed good chickens.

Free-lovers are today the "Brunos" and the "Galileos" in the social question, working for the elevation of the human species and the betterment of the human race. It is all right even with orthodox people to improve our horses and cattle by being very careful of their breeding. But, with "Freethinkers" even, it is all wrong and highly demoralizing to use the same good sense in improving the standard of our children.

I am eagerly waiting to see a full and complete reply made to the above mentioned editorial, from the free-lovers standpoint. And I know of no person who can do that so well as Moses Harman.

Scientific Motherhood.

[The following article I clip from the Chicago Sunday "Chronicle" of March 21 under the heading "Biren Arnold's Musings." I must say that my soul is filled with thankfulness to Lucifer and its co-workers for the great change in the sentiment that has been wrought in the darkened minds of manhood since Lucifer was first launched on the waves of public thought. An evolution that has become almost a revolution in these few short years, when a great Chicago daily will publish such thoughts as these. I have sometimes felt that the work of Lucifer was so thankless that the workers might get weary in well doing, so I send this as a word of cheer and with it my gratitude, for only as the whole race is lifted to a higher plane of right thinking, doing and living, can we elevate ourselves to any great extent.

MATTIE E. HUGHES.]

NEEDS A REVELATION.

The world needs a revelation. It wants a most decided shaking up; and it is going to get it. It is coming fast too, for the hour has arrived when forbearance has ceased to be a virtue and temporizing with evil will no longer answer our demands. The revolution will come, must come, through the broadening of the moral sense. The cultivation of the private virtues will lead to the inculcation of social virtues and the uplift of man as well as women. All this is to come about through a science of motherhood.

EVOLUTION AND REVOLUTION.

That is not revelation, do you say? But evolution! Did you ever see an evening primrose open? Over the yellow petals folds an opaque shield of green, heavy, inflexible, apparently, shutting from view all but the creamy tips of the blossom. Like a flash something stirs in its heart and instantly before your eyes the petals have unfolded, the feathery stamens are quivering in the evening air and the perfect blossom smiles up at you. This was evolution and yet revolution. By so much this movement in behalf of scientific motherhood will bring revolution about. That revolution has already come is evidenced by the thought growing everywhere that woman is the real guardian of the public health, the public morals. Gradually it is forcing its way into the schools and into the jails and reformatories. Woman's influence is widening and as it widens by so much the world grows better.

THE NATION'S HOPE AND GLORY.

The mothers of a nation are its hope and its glory, but the time has passed when the bare fact of motherhood alone will bear the stamp of approval. The day has passed when the Napoleons of the land only care for men to stand up and be shot at. There is a higher type, a wider destiny for men and women than the past has known, and the scientific rearing of the child is forcing its attention upon us. The world is filled with half-baked folks; folks who are fitted for nothing under heaven but to "chink in" like great Cæsar's dust, and possibly "keep the wind away," although I have my doubts about their efficacy in this respect.

WHAT IT WILL MEAN.

Scientific motherhood will come to mean in time the entire abolition of deformity, disease, imbecility, stupidity, drunkenness, malignancy and all the terrible ills that afflict our common humanity. It will mean a race of men and women fitted to cope with the questions which are every day forcing themselves upon us and leaving us in blank dismay at our inability to answer them. It will mean that our eyes have suddenly opened to new and great truths, and that the saving of the criminal, the reformation of the drunkard, the uplift of the world shall come about through woman's knowledge of herself, the grandeur of her mission and the splendor of her duties. She will find that in her hand lies the solution of many of these questions which so long have made her heavy at heart. The formation of these mothers' clubs in every little hamlet and community is the first step and a long step in the right direction. When women meet together to discuss something besides their every-day trials with their servants, the scandals in their neighborhood, or the very latest styles, they are on the the way to a higher and sweeter atmosphere, and when that discussion takes the form of scientific inquiry into the relationship of the mother and the public welfare as evidenced in her children they are in a fair way to discover and master all the possibilities of life. How much the world is dependent upon the ministrations of women, and how ably she can, if she will, fulfill her obligations! It rests with her to strike selfishness to the earth, send the dagger to the heart of oppression, and make love and sympathy the spiritual guides of man into the far off lands of brotherhood. It is her privilege, it might too be her pleasure, to help to make men brave and free, women loving and beautiful and children as innocent and happy as the prayer on the lips of an angel!

Sociologic Lesson. No. XXXV.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

TAXATION AND CURRENCY. So much of our currency as is needed to support the government is based not upon gold but upon taxation. If the government were to issue an entirely independent series of notes, not redeemable in gold, but receivable in all payments to the government, a very large number of such notes could be readily circulated at par among those who have taxes or duties to pay, or in other similar transactions.

To illustrate this principle, suppose the government should issue notes irredeemable in coin but receivable in all payments to the government at twice their nominal value, issuing less of such notes than it collects by taxation. Such notes would at once be far above par in the market, from the demand for them by those having duties to pay which they would necessarily pay partly in gold or other notes from the scarcity of these special tax notes. No law could force them into circulation at par, for they would be hoarded. Yet such notes, from their continually changing value, would be a very poor circulating medium.

The suggestion of another basis for the currency, arising from extensive necessity for the use of the notes, as in the payment of taxes, may assist hereafter in the establishment of a currency entirely independent of an apparent material basis; for all that is needed is that the currency shall be in universal demand, and with such evident and definite invariability that no one will fear the possibility of a change in its value. Before any other basis than gold can be advantageously employed, something must be discovered less likely to be affected in its exchangeable value by the rise and fall of governments, or other conceivable circumstances.

The W. C. T. U. addresses President McKinley as "Honored Ruler." Any company of people who do not know enough to know that the president is merely the administrator of government, executing the sovereign will of a free people, who have no "rulers," is hardly competent to advise anybody on any subject.—Chicago "Dispatch."

The "W. C. T. U." are in the right as to fact: the "Dispatch" voices a theory which more than a hundred years of experience has proved to be false. The W. C. T. U. people are honest in their belief that there should be human rulers to represent a supposed divine ruler in the skies, and therefore they are all the more dangerous, as teachers of the people, because of their honesty and consistency. All they lack is the power to carry out their theory, else we would have the religious despotism of the dark ages enthroned here in these United States of America.

"The sovereign will of a free people who have no rulers," is a ghastly joke, in view of the facts as they exist today.

The gist of essence of Paternalism lies in the assumption of every man that he is better qualified to attend to his neighbor's business than is his neighbor himself. Basing his principle—or, rather, his arguments in support of it—upon this pretension, he invariably invades the liberty of the individual. Curtail some one else's freedom, and he is pleased—his own abridged he rebels.—Valraus.

LUCIFER CIRCLE meets at 1394 West Congress street, Tuesday evening, March 30. William Trinkaus will read a paper on Industrial Re-organization.

MUCH space in this and last week's issue of Lucifer has been given to ideal life in a co-operative colony, as proposed by James Thierry who has had much experience in voluntary co-operation, and whose ideals seem to have the merit of originality. Whether they are practical at this stage of human development is a matter upon which all readers will probably not be agreed. It is hoped that all writers on co-operation, or on any other theme, will remember that Lucifer's pages are small and few in number, and that it is not fair to others to give much space to single articles, no matter how good they may be.

The Key Note of Reform.

"There will never be a generation of great men till there has been a generation of free mothers."—Robert G. Ingersoll.

"True, O King!" And if the greatest of American orators had said, "There never will be a generation of free men until there has been a generation of free mothers," the saying would have been equally true and timely. By the inexorable fiat of Dame Nature the makers of men must be free before men themselves can be free. The child of a willing slave will be, like its mother, a willing slave, else it will be like unto him who enslaves that mother, that is, it will be a tyrant; and a tyrant is never a free man.

Only he who "commands not nor obeys," is truly a free man.

Freedom means equal liberty for all, else it is not freedom.

"But if the mother be an unwilling slave, will not the maternal aspiration for liberty be incarnated and practicalized in and by her child?"

This is a question frequently asked, and is very pertinent to the humanitarian or stirpicultural problem.

Reasoning from what we know of hereditary tendency and of prenatal impression I think we should expect, from such a mother, nothing better than inefficient, discordant, unhappy and purposeless offspring. If the mother desires freedom but does not know enough, or has not courage enough, to strike for it—if she dares not to demand self-ownership of her person, and an equitable adjustment of economic arrangements as necessary conditions precedent to co-operation with man in the reproductive realm, then the prospective mother's mind is too ignorant or too weak, too timid or fearful, to create well-balanced, brave, resolute, reliable and self-reliant offspring.

The children of such mothers will, by natural causation, be inefficient, half-hearted, unreliable, and yet discontented, restless and longing for change, yet having no very definite idea of what they really need.

Such men naturally form the rank and file of the armies that follow and do the bidding of every ambitious and unscrupulous leader, whether such leader wants men to fight with ballots or bullets, and will be true to their leader so long as he can, by fair promises, convince them that he will divide with them the spoils of conquest. When deceived and betrayed by one demagogue they desert him and try another, but no matter how often betrayed and disappointed they never learn to be self-reliant and self-owning.

And thus it is that the children of slave mothers, whether contented or discontented slaves, can never be great nor free men.

What is a Dollar?

BY C. DUTTON.

Am glad to find in your edition of March 3 that you have discovered "serious objections to waiting until the series of 'Sociologic Lessons' was finished before venturing to criticise any one of them," and enjoyed the way you handled his untenable positions and assumptions. As I view the subject of finance, or money, Mr. Parkhurst is a back number, and needs to take quite a number of lessons before he will be "up to date" concerning it, provided he gives us his honest convictions. According to those the farthest advanced in legal lore, money—a dollar and its multiples—is not a tangible object, but an ideal unit in the ascending or descending scale of debts and credits.

Hence there are no such things legally as gold, silver or paper dollars.

The dollar and its multiples are used to measure debts and credits—to keep accounts. And as our government is a huge corporation, with all the officers necessary to keep its accounts (not to name a legion that is of no use whatever, other than to draw their salaries,) and transact all legitimate affairs attending their governing duties—and a perpetual pauper at that,—it sounds farcical in a writer of the mental caliber of friend Parkhurst when he, parrot-like, warbles "fiat money," the favorite phrase of the bankers and nearly all of the privileged classes. And also when he says, "The government assumes the debt and itself pays the promised dollars." He forgets the fact that the government has nothing to pay with; its entire revenue being derived from taxing the wealth producers.

Primitive modes, or methods, put in operation by mankind, are right and proper when they first come into vogue; simply from the fact, that, at the time, it was the best that it was possible to introduce.

But in the progress of humanity, up to something more desirable, there comes a time when old ideas, methods and opinions must give place to the new, those which have been found to be more in accordance with the laws of nature. "Now we rise to assert the right of moral law. We seek to introduce the moral element into politics," said Benjamin Skinner.

I wonder if the idea that money, regardless of the material that bears the stamp or impress, is public credit—a floating perpetual public debt—has never occurred to Friend Parkhurst, and that we give it the term money to distinguish it from private, personal, or co-operate credit. Now when Congress coins, stamps, prints or transfers dollars of credit to gold, silver or any other substance and issues it free to any class of our citizens (as it has persisted in doing since 1792, under the financial policy inaugurated by the tory element led on by A. Hamilton) it not only creates a fraudulent floating perpetual public debt by so-called law or act of Congress, but it also creates a privileged class who can not be made to contribute to the support of the government. All of which is not only in direct opposition to the plain provisions of our fundamental law, but is immoral in the highest degree.

Now if money is public credit, (and this statement has never been refuted) the most obtuse, when they stop nursing their prejudices, can see that its issue by our officials is a direct tax upon the toiler, every dollar of which must be paid or redeemed over and over again, in labor and its products—which alone pay all debts and taxes that are ever paid.

Hence as all money that is made legal tender by law is "fiat money," and as history will show conclusively that all money coined or stamped on paper has always been par money, when made legal tender for all dues and demands, and that it quite often commands a premium over gold or silver, why not demand that our officials abolish or repeal all existing modes of taxation and substitute therefor the single tax—the greenback? It will cost but little to coin or print a sufficient volume of money annually to defray the entire annual expense of our officials, as we must pay the salaries of those who superintend the affairs of that department, and it would probably suit them better to have some employment.

Any Congressman would be a sorry judge of equity or political economy who cannot see the grossest injustice and despotism in stamping the nation's credit (it is the aggregate credit of the toilers—the wealth producers that constitutes money) and issuing it free to one class of our citizens and then right upon the heels of this procedure to levy a tax upon the people, thus withdrawing money from circulation to pay interest to the very class to whom the money had been just issued, free, gratis, for nothing.

If money stamped on paper, will perform all the functions of any other money, what kind of political economy does it show in our rulers to go to the expense of mining gold and silver for that purpose?

Regarding your query "If debts were no longer collected by government authority, what use would there be for legal tender?"—why, my dear sir, to enforce the payment of the salaries of our officials from president down to constable. Now as it is impossible to abolish our government at once, let us unite as brothers in a moral cause—and abolish its worst feature—compel Congress to issue legal tender that shall represent the expenses of the government, instead of a gift to the bankers.

REMARKS.

Brother Dutton is doubtless correct in his opinion, or inference, that the chief use of legal tender money is to "enforce the payment of the salaries of our officials," and hence that the abolition of legal tender would mean the abolition of government itself—that is, of government by authority or force. If the citizens of a country could get along in their business with each other without legal tender money they would soon be asking why they could not get along in their business with their servants, the officials, without legal tender money. No discussion would sooner open the eyes of the people to the fact (now so often denied) that the people are not the sovereigns, not the rulers, but really and truly the subjects of their so-called servants, than would the discussion looking to the abolition of legal tender money. Hence we may rest assured that the governing classes,—the plutocrats who want legal tender to enforce the payment of bonds and interest on bonds, and the officials who want legal tender to enforce the payment of their salaries, we may be very sure these classes will never allow the question of abolition of legal tender to be decided by a vote of the people. These classes are too cunning and too selfish to commit suicide, in any such way.

The governing classes know that monarchy was revived in the United States when "legal tender" was made part of the Federal Constitution, hence, they will never allow a new constitutional convention to be called, lest it abolish the usurpation, the kingly despotism, enshrined in the clause which says, "Congress shall have power to coin money and fix the value thereof," the clause that takes out of the hands of the people the power of control over their circulating medium and debt-paying currency.

As between the present plutocratic financial system and the plan proposed by Friend Dutton, the "fiat money"—"greenback single tax"—shows to great advantage; and it is just possible that, with the false education we have all received in regard to the necessity of governments of force we shall all be obliged to pass through the phase of communism known as "fiat money;" yet some of us will still be asking, "Is there not a more excellent way?" What of the "labor check," now so successfully used in many places? So long as legal tender money means a government of coercion, a government of "force," will there not remain a thousand opportunities for robbery of the subject masses by the governing classes?—that is, by the officials and those who have the means to pay them well for jobbery and robbery in the name of "law and order?"

And this brings us to ask another question—why it is that the masses of people are so blind to their own interests and so easily made to consent to being robbed for the benefit of the privileged few? To some of us the only rational explanation is the inequalities of natural endowment and the inequalities of natural opportunity, before and after birth. Our social system—including the economic and financial, is eminently fitted to be self-perpetuating; eminently fitted to produce slaves and masters, sheep and wolves, subjects and rulers; and, as some of us see it, the true and only method to break up this system is by "Scientific Motherhood," as outlined by Birch Arnold in the Chicago "Chronicle," reprinted in this issue; and in order to get scientific motherhood the first and most necessary thing to do is to awaken mothers, and especially the young and prospective mothers, to see that upon them rests the chief responsibility of the perpetuation—or reconstruction—of our present robber systems—of government and of economics. Evolution of Immortal Terrestrial Gods and Goddesses and a Paradise on Earth

BY JAMES THIERRY.

(Concluded.)

Our financial system would be a paragon of soundness and utility and entirely unfit for purposes of extortion and enslavement, and free from the deluding metallic mirage. Our medium of exchange would circulate on wheels and never cowardly hide itself. It would be issued by the colony treasurer in payment for public improvements and services and constitute a representative of real and active value. In form and appearance it would be like a bank note, but in reality a non-interest bearing labor check. Its functions would be double. As a representative of the value of the products of labor, it would serve as an instrument of exchange, while the value itself, such as Market Hall, mills, machinery, etc., would also be usefully employed. These labor checks should have no outside circulation and would not be redeemed by the colony, except when a member should leave the colony and receive a check on the nearest bank from the colony treasurer in exchange for his labor checks.

The treasurer would be self-appointed, provided he could pass examination and would be the lowest bidder for the position he might keep as long as he should give satisfaction and would be the lowest bidder. He would be as harmless as the other employes and give no bonds to secure his honesty. All checks to draw money from the bank must be signed by him and three assistants elected, through the Equitable Ballot, for that purpose. The co-operators would deposit their plutocratic money at the bank and control it, to suit themselves, individually.

Such an arrangement would be the reverse of the plutocratic system, whose interest-bearing money will not circulate unless it can be profitably invested. The chief function of such money, is to hunt for money and it has done that so well that it ran itself out of game. Yes—the game has all been bagged and now there is no more to be had.

A currency that is monopolized and cannot circulate is a nuisance and it is a curse also, because it represents a value, gold, that lies dormant in the banker's vaults where the drowsy Mammon is as impotent as a myth.

The insurance fund would be maintained by regular contributions from every sane and adult member of the colony who in sickness, incapacity or old age would be entitled to a fixed daily allowance from said fund.

The schools would be conducted on the progressive kindergarten principle—not by favored stupefiers controlled with plutocratic money to befuddle and hypnotize the young and plastic mind with altruistic chimeras; but by self-appointed scientific professors, passing examination and being the lowest bidders for the positions they could hold as long as giving satisfaction and being the lowest bidders. Only scientific education would be tolerated at the public schools.

Each community would conduct its own private affairs to suit itself. The co-operators may pool their interests or work separately and independently to suit themselves, and expose their products in the Market Hall, for sale to the highest bidders. These products would be labelled with the lowest prices, so that buyers could suit themselves either in buying or leaving them if they considered the prices too high or the quality too low to tempt them. Such is free competition.

For outside business, either commercial or otherwise, the colony would employ a self-appointed agent who could pass examination and be the lowest bidder for the appointment, which he could retain as long as he gave satisfaction and was the lowest bidder. Instead of being the master he would be controlled by three assistants, elected through the Equitable Ballot. All outside transactions would be signed by the agent and assistants after being directed to do so by the co-operators in a decision obtained through the Equitable Ballot and published in the colony paper.

When our colony shall have evolved better surroundings and characters, such precautions will be useless; at present they would be needed to protect ourselves against infringements and demoralizing influences.

In Honduras the land is untaxed, a fact that cannot be too highly appreciated by the crowd of unfortunates who had their lands confiscated on account of delinquent taxes. We would not tax ourselves to defray the public expenses, nor borrow money for that purpose; we would avoid the unbearable burden by the issue of non-interest-bearing labor checks. The small amount of plutocratic money needed, for outside business, could be raised by the co-operators, delivering a stipulated amount of surplus products, at the Market Hall, to be sold to outsiders for cash. Many years ago I had a dream—the dream of a Communist. The rapturous happiness I experienced in that dream I shall never forget, and when long ago I described it on my tablets I wrote:

> This is the dream I had to face
> And that will never let me rest;
> By which I'm haunted day and night
> And forced for Truth and Love to fight
> Until darkest night
> Shall give way to Light!

A Communist I am no more—nor an Altruist. I am a fatalist and feel that I shall not lie down to rest in the wakeless sleep before the realization of the alluring mirage in that dream, for which I have lived and labored almost seventy years and missed becoming a millionaire. As a fatalist and reincarnationist I believe that the irresistible actions of both our dear brother Samuel Putnam and dear sister May Collins were so interwoven even before their birth, that they could not possibly avoid their fate and departing hand in hand and may reappear together on the scene of life.

It would not be strange if the Putnam-Collins catastrophe should—nay I believe will—lead, if fatalism be true, to the birth of a New Humanity. Let the Freethinkers and Liberals of the world unite for action in the erection of a monument to our worthy brother and sister; this would be so very natural and easy that I think it will be done. The next step would be to select the most favored spot on earth, away from the bitter frost and the burning sun and altruistic cannibals; where life is easy and a luxury among intelligent and non-invasive neighbors who mind their own business, and there lay the foundation for and build the Samay (Sam and May) Progressive Co-operative Colony; the play ground—not of the long eared and short-sighted Midas, but of the best and noblest of our race; the grandest monument ever raised to the memory of a terrestrial god and goddess. Let the sturdy pioneers in our ranks take the matter in hand and they will find it easy and pleasant work.

We would need no complicated and expensive organization. Our Brother Harman of Chicago, Illinois, could be our treasurer. He has been long and well tried and could, like Bruno, be trusted, as well as others yet amongst us, if they were known. Lucifer could be our mouth-piece to conduct our discussions, communicate information, publish the receipts of contributions and our decisions. The Equitable Ballot, after full discussion, would decide all questions equitably, without intrigue, favoritism or fraud. Thus we should, from the very beginning, accustom ourselves to do our own thinking, conduct our own affairs and dispense with those expensive frauds, called representatives and extensively known as misrepresentatives.

Just think how pleasant it would be, for weary and aged humanitarians, to know that there is a refuge, somewhere, on the face of the earth where they may spend the rest of their days among friends they could trust and be true to themselves and their surroundings; where shams and hypocrisy would be unknown.

If a minimum of one thousand, bona fide, subscribers contributing each one cent per day, for at least one year, toward a progressive co-operative colony fund, can be secured, I will head the list with twenty-five dollars and perhaps more.

It is impossible to regenerate the corrupt and nothing is gained by mixing the good with the bad, while there would be a great advance in propagating only from the good. We carefully separate the good seeds from the bad ones and do not sow them amongst a multitude of weeds. And so it is with us, it is sheer folly to propagate wings in hell, where they are singed off as fast as they grow.

Colonization is the only alternative, if we are to save humanity from retrogression and a return to the savagery of the middle ages.

In my study of the problem of problems, the evolution of a new humanity free from stupefiers, parasites and misery, I discovered that harmonious progressive co-operative colonization would solve the problem, provided it were possible to leave the decaying hypocritical agglomeration, where they preach impossible altruism and devote themselves to the enjoyment of cannibalism, and colonize where the sex relations and institutions are yet free, the surroundings beautiful and comfortable and life a luxury instead of a burden. Honduras seems admirably adapted for our purpose and to contain but one drawback in the occasional presence of an insect ravaging the vegetation in its passage across the country. Such visitation, however, may hardly be called a drawback in a land whose ground is free from taxation and where they raise two and three crops a year easier than we can raise one here. We must also be able to dispense with stupid and knavish majority and minority rules, corrupt representatives and an expensive and demoralizing colony government.

I found that all this would be quite possible through self-appointed public employes without authority and controlled by the community by means of a colony paper and Equitable Ballot. When I had proceeded thus far, I became aware that I had not yet discovered the principle of harmonious progressive co-operation. It finally dawned upon me that such a principle may be termed amphibious progression; consisting in a vibration between decentralization and centralization.

I am now firmly convinced that a co-operative colony cannot harmoniously progress, unless it freely and alternately passes from decentralization to centralization and gradually returns to decentralization and so on forever, unhindered by legislative invasion and consequent disorder and degradation.

These amphibious alternations cannot be classed as individualistic, nor do they correspond with collectivism, but are in accordance with Amphibious Progressism, a new sociological philosophy that may yet rank among the highest factors in the evolution of the most exalted gods and goddesses from the lowest demons and demonesses and in elevating the bottom of Hades to the summit of Olympus, in realizing the fabulous delights of that once famous residence of Jupiter and Company.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

"With weak and trembling hands I once more arrayed myself for his coming. I wore a loose robe of creamy silk fastened only with a white silken cord at the waist. My last week's experience had robbed me of the roses that the few previous weeks had called to my cheeks. It was Sunday evening and I hardly dared hope that he would come that night. It was the sweet Maytime and a great bunch of lilacs filled the room with their fragrance. The evening was warm. Doors and windows were open, and I think I must have fallen asleep in my rocker for I heard no sound, yet was aroused suddenly by the feeling of a face close to mine. For a moment I was frightened and involuntarily uttered a cry, but the next moment seeing who it was, and forgetting everything but that he, my friend, my lover, had returned, I sprang to my feet and with the cry, 'Owen! Owen!' I cast myself upon his breast and twined my arms about his neck. In that moment I knew that he had not ceased to love me, as I had feared, for holding me close in his arms he pressed me to him and almost smothered me with his kisses, whispering again and again,

"'My little girl, my own little woman, you love me now, my sweet? I have not waited in vain?' I answered him only with a happy laugh. My heart was too full for anything else, but he understood, for he again rained kisses upon my face calling me by every endearing name that love had ever invented. He never rightly explained why he had remained so long away, but I understood then that circumstances over which he had no control had caused it, and little did I care in my new-found happiness, for I was happy—happy as I had never thought I could be. I sat upon his knee with my arms clasped about his neck until away into the night. We had not struck a light; he would not let me be free long enough to do so. There was no need, he said, and I know that not one softly whispered word of love was lost, and with the most perfect ease his lips found mine. The hour had come and gone that he was wont to leave me, but as midnight approached he laid his lips to my ear and whispered words that for a moment caused my heart to stand still, and then to bound as if to break its confines. The past year had made a different woman of me and I now, as never before, wanted the respect of the man whom I loved. He felt my heart beating so madly and I know he guessed the cause. He laid his face to mine and pleadingly, tremblingly spoke.

"'Darling, can you not trust me? my timid fluttering birdie? I would not harm one shining hair upon this precious head.' And I did trust him, for O Imelda, I loved him, I loved him. You, looking down from your pure and lofty heights can not understand it, but it was all so different from that first experience that I had. I tried to realize the enormity of my wrong-doing but I could not feel impure when I was in his arms. My love for Owen was something different from what I had hitherto deemed love to be. I felt myself lifted above everything sordid, everything unclean. Every feeling, every thought connected with him was as something holy, and now, as then, the thought will force itself upon my mind. How is it possible that true, pure love can ever be deemed impure! when its fires are so purifying that only holy emotions find room in the heart.

"But our love was without sanction of either church or state and therefore the world would place its seal, its stamp of 'outcast' upon the brow of such as I. But is it not somewhere written that much shall be forgiven to those who love much? And the short time that followed I was madly, intensely happy, while Owen seemed to be no less so. He would catch me in his arms and lift me up as if I were a baby while his blue eyes shone with a light as of heaven.

"'My one darling! my precious one!' O, how often did he say these words while I pressed his fair head to my heart and thought heaven was in his arms." Cora broke off with a choking sob, while the tears once more rolled down the pale cheek. Imelda was still upon her knees at her side, was still fondling the white hand when Cora again turned to her:

"Why don't you turn from me? I who have been a mother, who have granted to man the greatest boon of love a woman can bestow,—without first being a wife! Why are you not angry with me? I am sure I deserve it!"

"Why, my poor, dear Cora! Why should I be angry with you? For loving a noble man? I hope I am not so narrow, and that I am able to judge you more fairly."

Cora's hazel eyes expanded to their utmost extent.

"Melda, what do you mean? I do not understand. Do you not curse him and despise me?"

Imelda shook her head,

"Neither," she answered. "Although I do not quite understand, yet according to your description of the man I get the impression that he was noble and good. Nothing at all to warrant a judgment so cruel from me. But now you must keep calm or I shall not permit you to speak farther. I insist that you lie down and rest, as this excitement may prove injurious to you."

"And if it should make an end of my miserable life it might be the best thing that could happen to me. I have been of but little good in the world,—only to bring pain and sorrow into the lives of others."

"Now, now, Cora! Is it right you should talk like this when you have but just finished telling of the love of your Owen and the happiness you have brought to him?" Cora put her hand to her head,

"You confuse me," she said "To hear you speak like this causes me to doubt my senses. I do not understand." Imelda smiled.

"But you will understand, by and by, when you know all. Now I am waiting to hear the rest of your story."

"The rest of my story? Would that it ended there; then, maybe, I might still have some faith that my life is not all in vain. But to return and finish. My dream was too bright and beautiful to last. Such intense bliss is not for this world. I ought to have told you before how I lived. Owen had furnished a small house for me in princely style. It was far up town and stood in a grove of trees and isolated from the neighborhood. A most beautiful garden was attached to it with richly scented flower-beds and vines and ivy-covered arbors. Certainly a lovely spot and a perfect lovers' home. From the windows I could see the blue waters of the Hudson and often I watched the stately steamers proudly sail up and down its silver-hued bosom. As I stated once before, Owen had procured a nurse to attend me in my hour of trial, a faithful colored woman, and she had lived with me from that time on, keeping my nest a bower of beauty. She always thought I was Owen's wife and he said nothing to dispel that belief. She probably often thought it queer that during all that year he had spent only a few hours in the evening of each day with me, but she never said anything.

"One day when I was more happy, if that were possible, than usual, a carriage drove up to my little heaven. A footman opened the door and a richly attired lady stepped therefrom and slowly came up the shaded path. Old Betty met her at the door; I heard them speak but could not understand what was said. The old woman led the lady into our cosy little parlor and then came to me in my own pretty bed chamber upstairs. She brought me a card upon which I read, 'Mrs. O. Hunter.' I stared at the card while all kinds of thoughts flitted through my mind, only not the right ones. I took the little piece of pasteboard and went downstairs to 'Mrs. O. Hunter.' She was a woman of perhaps twenty-eight or thirty years of age, very tall, a decided brunette with flashing black eyes. Her features were sharp, and a look indicating that her tongue could be as sharp. I looked helplessly at her and then at the card in my hand."

BY JAMES S. DENSON.

The solons of the various states are engaged in a competitive match for the prize of idiocy. The aspirants are numerous and vociferous. Out in Nevada, one of them has donned the cap of the clown and is shaking the bells in the frantic effort to call attention to his bill for the suppression of the Sunday newspaper. But he has a more malignant rival in Kansas.

Down in Texas a member of the legislature has introduced a bill for the abolition of the Roman numerals. Well, it will not make much difference, as far as this man Vaughn is concerned, whether he succeeds or fails—we can call him Dunderhead I. or Dunderhead No. 1, and it will mean just the same. The Missouri Senate has passed a bill relieving persons of the necessity of carrying out their contracts with trusts, and its Committee on Labor has favorably reported a bill establishing a State Board of Horseshoe Examiners. Hurrah for the next immortal! But how is Nordau to keep up with his studies of contemporary degenerates?

The newspaper writers profess to be greatly amazed because the three widows left by Charles W. Brooke, the famous criminal lawyer, knew of each other's existence while Brooke lived and yet made "no fuss" about the condition of affairs, and now appear to cherish no ill feelings toward him nor toward each other. One of the reporters says that the view taken by one of the widows is "positively unique." He thus characterizes her opinions because she says she left Brooke when they could no longer agree, and does not care to sue what she regards as a bankrupt estate! By this the reader can easily judge of the capacity for surprise possessed by the newspaper man. He cannot understand common sense in love relations. So slight an acquaintance has he with the quality that he calls it uniqueness.

Felix Adler, in his lecture on "The Ethics of Marriage," says: "People seem to think there are only two parties to a marriage—the man and the woman. There are three parties to every marriage—the man, the woman, society." How tenacious of life is a lie! This particular one has been told so often that no doubt Professor Adler (in common with the great majority of the people) looks upon it as a sacred truth. But there is no such entity as the "society" posited by the lecturer. Society is not an organism, as the statement implies. Society is merely an aggregation of individuals, with the desires, needs, joys, and miseries of individuals. Each individual is subject to invasion, and can suffer therefrom. Other individuals may be affected by the love of a man and a woman, but how can they be invaded thereby? Only by having to care for the possible fruits of that love. But does the institution of monogamic marriage preserve them from this invasion? Not at all. On the other hand, there are the best of reasons for thinking that the reduction to a minimum of dependent orphanage will be conterminous with or follow the disappearance of compulsory monogamy.

In indissoluble marriage we can choose only once, but is Professor Adler a Catholic? Does he hold that there can never be a dissolution of the marriage contract? If he does, then he is beyond the reach of reason. But if he admits that some causes will justify divorce, then he demolishes his own affirmation—he admits that sometimes we can choose more than once, he admits that the bondage is not "in the nature of the relation itself," as certainly it is not. Unless there are children, the problem is no problem at all; if the man and woman are convinced they will be happier apart than together they will separate, under the coming conditions of freedom. Children will often complicate the problem, but there need then be no dissolution of pecuniary and industrial interests if the parents are rational, for if they are, neither will in the least interfere with the other's enjoyment of other friends and lovers. At the worst, it will be better for the children to go with one parent or to outsiders even than to remain in a household where dissension and hate have taken the place of harmony and love.

"The strange case of a woman willing to swear to her own disgrace in order to prevent her husband from whom she had separated from obtaining possession of her child," was revealed in a court in Jersey City the other day. In 1893 William Jaeger and his wife separated. The child was born a few weeks after the separation. A Mrs. Mangersheim had found it in an institution for the poor and had taken it home with her. Subsequently, Mrs. Jaeger consented to her keeping it and she then got legal possession, which Mrs. Jaeger is anxious she should retain. Jaeger sues for the custody of the boy. Now Mrs. Jaeger comes into court and, to prevent the child being given to Jaeger, swears that he is not its father. Supreme Court Commissioner Nugent seems to think the case an unprecedented one, but it has happened before that the mother's love had been stronger than the woman's fear of the curses of Mrs. Grundy. Jaeger declares that his wife was "true"; that the only cause of trouble between them was her temper. I think it may be taken for granted that Mrs. Jaeger is setting a dangerous example to her sisters; "dangerous" from the point of view of the orthodox marriageist, for when it becomes possible for the love of the mother to often dominate and dwarf the fear of society's frown in the way Mrs. Jaeger's love has done, will it not be a short and easy step to the frank assumption of the responsibilities and joys of motherhood without leave asked of society or state? Mrs. Jaeger is an emancipator of her sex and of human love.

As no roads are as rough as those that have been mended, so no sinners are so intolerant as those that have just turned saints.—Colton.

A Free Man's Creed.

BY MOSES HARMAN.

[The "Free Thought Magazine," (Chicago,) edited by H. L. Green, for April, contains the following article by the editor of Lucifer. This brief ethical exposition was called out by the frequent allusions to Lucifer, in the leading editorial of the "Free Thought Magazine" for January, in which editorial Lucifer was called the "organ of the free-lovers of this country,"—and in which such phrases as "this damnable doctrine of free love," "the curse of free love," etc., were of frequent occurrence. The impartial and unprejudiced reader is requested to read carefully both the article and the reply thereto by Mr. Green. It is only by a candid comparison of conflicting views that truth on any subject of human investigation can be arrived at. The heading placed upon my article by Mr. Green was "A Free Lover's Creed." With this exception no change from the original has been made in Lucifer's office. M. H.]

In the March number of this Magazine the editor promises that in the next issue "Moses Harman, editor of Lucifer, will give his Free Love creed, as it were—set forth fully what he believes and advocates on the marriage question."

As fully as possible in the space allowed, I will try to make good this promise.

My creed is short. Instead of "Thirty-nine" articles, it has but three:

I believe in Freedom—the negation of all slaveries.

I believe in Love—the negation of all hate.

I believe in Wisdom, Knowledge utilized—the negation of all ignorance.

I put Freedom first, because, until freedom prepares the way, neither Love nor Wisdom can have room to live and grow.

In these three—Freedom, Love, Wisdom—we have a creed much better adapted to working out the problems of life than is the trinity of our childhood—"Father, Son and Holy Ghost."

If belief in this trinity, and if a life regulated in accord therewith, constitute one a "Free Lover," then I do not object to the cognomen. Whether Free Lover is a title of honor or dishonor will depend upon what is in the mind of the speaker. "As a man thinketh in his heart so is he." Names count for but little, and are apt to be misleading. For this reason I do not label or tag myself, and I object to being tagged by others. Freethinker, Rationalist, Libertarian, are good and expressive, but each has its limitations in the minds of most people. Free thought, to my mind, includes and necessitates free action—free, non-invasive action. The thought that has not the courage of its convictions—that fears to practicalize and live what it believes to be right—is not Free Thought. It is thought under bondage to fear.

Yes, I believe in Freedom—equal freedom. I want no freedom for myself that all others may not equally enjoy. Freedom that is not equal is not freedom. It is, or may easily become, invasion, and invasion is the denial or the death of freedom. The Spencerian formula: "Each has the right to do as he pleases, so long as he does not invade the equal right of others," tells what freedom means. It is equivalent to saying that liberty, wedded to responsibility for one's acts, is the true and only basis of good conduct, or of morality.

But to particularize:

I believe in Freedom to choose and to refuse in matters of food, of drink, of clothing, of books, of paintings, of amusements, of recreations, and—most important of all—I believe in freedom to choose and refuse in matters pertaining to companionships with the other sex. Freedom to choose our food and drink relates mainly to the life of the individual, but the choice of sex-companionship relates mainly to the life of the race, and is therefore incomparably the more important, inasmuch as the whole includes all the component units. The main effort of nature, in the plant and the animal, is to "keep the ball of life rolling"—to preserve the race or species from dying out, with less regard as to what becomes of individual units. Hence amative desire, or sex-love, is more imperious—less under control of calculating prudence, than is any other inherited desire or passion—and rightly so.

Freedom of choice—to be freedom—must be unlimited as to time. To be able to choose the kind or quality of one's food or drink but once in a lifetime would not be freedom. It would be the negation, the suicide of freedom. And so also is sex-companionships.

The right to make mistakes and to profit by them is vitally necessary to human happiness and progress, and pre-eminently is this true in the most important of all human relationships—that which grows out of the differentiation called sex, since this relationship concerns not only the happiness, the unfoldment, of each individual, but—for weal or woe, for success or failure, for uplifting or for degeneracy, it is this relationship that reproduces the race—the larger selfhood.

I believe in Love; because love is the uniting, the combining, the organizing, the creative force of the universe. It is also the refining, the purifying, the uplifting, the glorifying, the happifying force of the universe. Whoever or whatever debases or kills love, debases or kills life; for life is evolved and preserved through love. Without love life is a desert—not worth having.

I believe in Wisdom—knowledge utilized—because without wisdom to guide, both freedom and love may fail to bring lasting happiness. I believe in wisdom; it is the result of the exercise of love in freedom—love profiting by its mistakes; hence wisdom is the child of love in freedom.

It is because I believe in this trinity that I do not believe in marriage. These three are humanity's saviors and marriage crucifies them all. Marriage destroys freedom and compels slavery. Marriage kills love and incarnates hate. Marriage is the inveterate foe of wisdom and incarnates ignorance.

"Free Love" is tautological, since there can be no love where freedom is not. If love survive marriage it is not because of, but in spite of, marriage.

Bond love is a misnomer, an impossibility. The attempt to bind love kills it, or changes it to jealousy and hate.

Love, freedom, wisdom, constitute life's zenith, its sunshine; marriage, jealousy, hate, mean life's nadir, its darkness.

"Ignorance is the only darkness," says Shakspeare, and marriage promotes and compels ignorance, lest its victims learn how to gain their freedom.

I accept and heartily indorse Mr. Green's motto for the proposed new Free Thought organization, "Truth, Justice and Purity," and because I indorse that noble trinity I am an opponent of marriage and an advocate of love in freedom.

I oppose marriage because marriage opposes truth. Marriage is the hot-bed, the prolific breeding ground of deception, hypocrisy, falsehood. By its anti-natural requirements it compels men, and especially women, to dissemble and hide their real thoughts, their real characters, and after the fateful knot is tied the necessity for living a lie is often augmented manyfold. Whether they love or not, the married pair must still profess that they are true to each other and to their marriage vows; and this perpetual profession helps, of itself, to bring the disillusioning. But the disillusioning does not release from the necessity of deception, but rather increases it. The retroactive effect of this habitual deception is fatal to health and to noble development of the wedded pair themselves, and by inexorable causation the children born of such unions are hereditary liars and hypocrites. What wonder that there is so little of candor, of truth and of honesty in business, in politics, in religion, in love, and in all the relations of life?

I oppose marriage because it opposes justice. Marriage is unjust to woman—depriving her of her right of ownership and control of her person, of her children, her name, her time and her labor. Marriage is unjust to children—depriving them of their right to be born well through natural selection; depriving them of the right to be born of love—of love on all three planes, the physical, the intellectual and the psychic; and compelling them to be born of indifference or of disgust, on one or more of these planes; depriving them of their right to be reared in an atmosphere of concord and love, instead of an atmosphere of inharmony and hate. Unjust to woman and man alike, in that it deprives both of their natural right to correct their mistakes whenever they recognize them to be such; condemning them to a hell on earth until one or the other, in sheer desperation, shall commit what the marriage law calls a crime sufficiently heinous to release them—after passing through the added hell of the divorce court.

What wonder that the world is filled with hate, with greed, with strife, with wars—of households and of nations—when we remember how and where human beings are made and reared?

I oppose marriage because it opposes Purity. Purity in sex-companionship is inseparable from love. Marriage does not recognize love as essential to purity, else it would demand the annulment of the marriage bond whenever there is a failure of love. Marriage unites "for better or worse," and marriage secures the worse by killing love. Marriage is ownership, especially the ownership of woman by man; marriage is force, authority, law, and love instinctively rebels against all force, all law, except its own.

Hence marriage fosters and compels impurity, prostitution, within its own pale—the worst of all prostitutions, since it is in marriage, mainly, that children are born. Marriage promotes impurity—prostitution—outside its own pale. Marriage is the prolific source of unmarried prostitution. The brothel is the legitimate outgrowth and complement of modern marriage.

I oppose marriage for much the same reason that I opposed its twin relic of barbarism, African slavery—because I believe it to be the "sum of all villainies," and I say of the laws made to enforce it, as Garrison said of the Constitution of the United States—they are a "covenant with death and a league with hell," figuratively speaking.

Many other indictments, equally damning might be made against this time-dishonored institution, but I have room only to say that I oppose marriage because I regard it the heaviest load that humanity has now to carry in its toilsome march from the lowlands of barbarism to the highlands of civilization.

It will doubtless be objected that evolution has been at work, and marriage is now only a "contract," to those who wish to make it such. Never was a greater mistake. The law dictionaries and the encyclopedias tell quite a different story. They tell us that "its complete isolation from all other contracts is constantly recognized by the courts." "In marriage every right and duty is fixed by law." And the law of marriage is based on the old Roman and the Canon law, both of which put the wife in the power of the husband—sink her individuality in that of the husband.

That marriage is less brutal than it once was is because man has risen faster than his institutions, and in spite of his institutions. Hence most husbands are better than the marriage laws authorize or allow them to be. But the same may be said of the old slave owners.

As Burke said of government, so we may say of marriage: "Talk not of its abuse; the thing, the thing itself, is the abuse." To abolish the abuses of marriage, then, is to abolish marriage.

"But what will you give us instead of marriage?" it will doubtless be asked. This is like asking what will you give us when you take away disease or superstition. The answer is, when disease is gone, health will remain; when superstition is gone, nature and reason will remain; when marriage is gone, Truth Justice and Purity will remain. Honor, candor, honesty, fidelity will remain. Fewer children will be born, because none will be born except such as are wanted, and they will be welcomed and cared for by mutual affection. The true, rational family will take the place of the narrowly selfish despotism now called by that name. Each member of the voluntary groups will drop to his place like stones in an arch when artificial props are removed. Government by authority will cease, because no longer needed.

Love, friendship, liberty, equality, fraternity, peace and happiness will take the place of hate, despotism, war and misery.

As to monogamy—a very different thing from marriage—under the reign of love, freedom and wisdom, there will be an opportunity for intelligent comparison, and if monogamy proves itself the fittest it will survive; otherwise it will give way to something better. What that something would or could be cannot be told until a fair comparison is possible.

SUPPLEMENTARY:

The foregoing article on what Editor Green calls a "Free Lover's Creed," though somewhat long, is really a condensation, a boiling down of a much longer and more elaborate statement. Many points were materially weakened, and some left out entirely, to fit the space allowed in the "Freethought Magazine," and now that the fight is forced upon us,—not only by conservative Freethinkers, such as those who indorse the "Free Thought Magazine", but also by some of the radical reformers in the social realm who have been saying that Lucifer's attitude on this pivotal question is non-committal or "neutral," because of all these I think it best to insert here the substance of what was originally written for the "Free Thought Magazine" and not published.

But before doing this I wish once more to remind all readers that I represent no one but myself, and that I represent myself for this day and hour only. Tomorrow my selfhood will probably be not the identical selfhood it is today. Or, perhaps more correctly, I can not honestly promise that the views I hold today will be held by me tomorrow. Like a planet or a sun, in its course through the skies, I expect to take a new departure every day, and perhaps every waking hour, of my life. With every new experience, and with every increase of light the sum total of my knowledge, of my thought, the sum total of all that makes up the ego—the me—is changed, and he who refuses to acknowledge the change, and who tries to hold himself to a creed or "confession of faith," stultifies his own reason, bars his future growth, denies and dishonors manhood, if he does not commit intellectual or moral suicide.

Elaborating some of my indictments against marriage, as it is defined in the Common Law, the Canon Law and the statutes of most of the states in this country, and perhaps adding a few new indictments, I would say:

I oppose marriage because marriage legalizes rape. The law does not recognize marital rape. "Once consent always consent," say the law and the gospel of marriage. If Webster is correct when he says rape is "sexual intercourse with a woman against her will," then "rape in wedlock" is almost universal at some time during married life, as nearly every wife could testify—if she dared. If the wife submits—surrenders her person—through fear, or because of a sense of duty, or for any reason except love, such surrender may be more properly called "prostitution" on her part, but on the part of the husband it is rape, pure and simple; and because I oppose both rape and prostitution I oppose marriage.

I oppose marriage because marriage is love's greatest enemy. "Mariage is love's miscarriage." The marriage bond is essentially bondage, and love will endure no bondage—except such as itself imposes.

> Love's wing moults when caged or captured—
> Only free it soars enraptured.
> Can you keep the bee from ranging;
> Or the ring-dove's neck from changing?
> No, nor fettered love from dying
> In the knot there's no untying.

These lines do not voice simply the experience of the rover, the sensualist—him who knows nothing of love except in its physical manifestations, but they voice the honest verdict of all the ages and of all, or nearly all, who have surrendered freedom and self-ownership for married bondage; and the few exceptions which seem to disprove the rule can be shown to be not exceptions at all. When closely examined it will be found that the few married lovers live above marriage—that the ethics of their lives are the ethics of courtship rather than of marriage.

THIS WEEK'S Lucifer is monopolized by the editor, to a very unusual extent, in order to fully present his views on the question of Freedom versus Marriage. The "Free Thought Magazine," the "Blue Grass Blade" and some other journals, have for years been speaking of Lucifer as "the organ of the free lovers of this country," the "free love sheet," etc. When receiving the weekly dues for the paper at the post office the gentlemanly clerk said, "Is your paper a free love organ?" Frequently the same question is heard from people who ask for information and not because of hostility. To answer these questions in few words is not possible, and so this edition of Lucifer is largely devoted to a candid, straight-forward and, as far as possible, complete statement of what the editor believes to be the main points in controversy between those who advocate institutional marriage and those who accept the logic of Freethought, or of freedom in all departments of life. Long as this statement seems it is still incomplete, and will probably be supplemented in succeeding issues of Lucifer.

Joseph Anthony.

The following brief announcement will be read with regretful interest by many of Lucifer's readers:

"Passed to other realms, on the evening of February 27, in this city, Los Angeles, Calif., Joseph Anthony, aged sixty-seven years. He was a friend and champion of Lucifer, and occasional contributor to its columns. A good man; a just man."

For ten years or more Joseph Anthony has been one of the most faithful and most helpful of all those who have made the cause of Lucifer their own. He was one of those who never let his "left hand know what his right hand did," figuratively speaking, and with reference to deeds that are commonly called generous or charitable. He was a "Friend," or Quaker by birth and education and though discarding theologies of all kinds he retained the phraseology and many of the mental characteristics of the followers of William Penn.

For several years his health had been failing and for that reason he made his home in Southern California. It is hoped that his daughter, or some one who knew him well, will send us a more detailed account of the life and labors of "Friend Joseph," as he was familiarly called by those who knew him best and who loved him for his many noble qualities of head and heart.

The Gospel of Discontent.

Lucifer is not an "organ" of any sect, party, "ism" or organization, but it has a "mission,"—it has a work to do, and is trying to do that work to the best of its limited ability.

Its first and most important work, as seen by those most nearly responsible for its management, is to preach the gospel of discontent.

Until people become discontented with their environment it is utterly hopeless to expect them to make an effort to better themselves, or their condition.

For instance, so long as the average citizen is content to pay his servants in Washington salaries ranging from five thousand dollars a year to fifty thousand a year, with perquisites, or extras, amounting to quite as much more, while he himself receives less than one thousand a year, and so long as the citizen is content to see these servants go off on fishing excursions and other holiday vacations of their own making, with free passes in palace cars, or on government steamers, with all other expenses paid by those who can afford no holiday excursion or vacation from year end to year end; and so long as the citizen is content to allow a financial system to exist that enables a public servant to begin his term of office a poor man and to come out of it a multi-millionaire, while the citizen himself, with constant and unremitting toil and pinching economy can save absolutely nothing for a rainy day, for sickness or old age; and so long as he is content to uphold a financial system that allows foreign and domestic debt-holders to violate their contracts and to thereby double the value of their holdings while reducing by half the power of the debtor to pay the debts; and so long as the citizen upholds a land-and-money system that allows one woman,—Hetty Green, and her son, Ed. Green, (Chairman of the Republican State Central committee of Texas) to foreclose mortgages upon one hundred and fifty firms, or individual debtors—in Chicago alone to the amount of four millions of gold dollars, (as they are now doing) with a multitude more of debtors in the same toils whose turn may come in the near future—so long as no rebellion is inaugurated against a land and money system that enables a few persons to monopolize the earth and its opportunities, thereby making slaves or beggars of the great masses of mankind;—just so long as such contentment as this prevails there is and will be absolutely no rational ground of hope that poverty, crime and misery will ever be lessened, or that the sum total of human happiness will be increased.

Lucifer is by no means the only evangelist that is preaching the gospel of discontent along the lines just enumerated. There are many hundreds, perhaps thousands, of journals, now published in this country and in many other countries, that are trying hard to wake people out of their stupid contentment under the economic and governmental systems that rob them, and that are gradually but surely becoming more powerful, year by year, while the power of resistance to these oppressions and oppressors seems growing yearly less and less.

But while Lucifer gladly recognizes these helpers in the work of governmental and economic reform there is one field of agitation, one department of reformatory endeavor in which Lucifer stands and works almost alone, and that is the reform that demands the Freedom of Woman from SEX SLAVERY.

While Lucifer clasps hands with all reforms and reformers who work for human liberty, and who demand equal justice for all, it recognizes that there is a reform more important than all other reforms, viz.: the reform that would strike the shackles from the bodies and minds of the mothers of men. Lucifer recognizes that while men are enslaved, governmentally, economically and financially, women are enslaved not only in all of these regards but also in their sex-natures, in their reproductive powers and functions; that while man is a slave woman is the slave of a slave.

Lucifer recognizes that until woman is free to own her person; free to do her best as a race-builder; free at all times to choose and refuse in the matter of co-operators in her work of race-reproduction; free at all times to say whether or not she shall become a mother, and free to demand and receive right conditions of all sorts necessary to practicalize the right of children to be born well—if born at all—Lucifer recognizes that until woman's freedom on these lines is achieved all other freedoms will avail but little—or rather that all other human freedoms will fail of accomplishment.

Slave mothers cannot give birth to a race of free men!

And this is why Lucifer's work is mainly to preach the gospel of discontent to women, to the mothers and prospective mothers of the human race. As yet the great masses of women are not awake to the fact that they are slaves—not conscious of their own degradation as individual human beings—not conscious of the fearful responsibility that rests upon them as creators of man and of man's institutions. Woman does not see that man's institutions will be like unto himself,—neither better nor worse, and that man himself will be as his mother makes him, neither better nor worse.

Lucifer recognizes not only the importance but the difficulties, the almost insurmountable difficulties that bar the way to the realization of woman's emancipation from sex-slavery. This reform is by far the most unpopular of all reforms. Woman herself is the worst foe of her own freedom. Through ages of submission to her spiritual guides, whose power over mankind depends upon their control of woman and of her children, she regards sex-reform as wicked, impious, "disreputable" and unclean! With woman herself, and with her legal lords, and with her spiritual and legal advisers all banded against us, Lucifer's work is pre-eminently a thankless one, and, so far as the life of the present generation is concerned, a well-nigh hopeless work.

But to him who can look forward to the centuries to come there is hope. Happily the life of the race is not confined to this present generation of women and men, and if only a few can now be awakened there is hope that the discontent will grow, as the years roll on, increasing in a geometric ratio, so that he who shall look backward from the heights of a thousand years from now may reasonably be expected to wonder at the contentment, the enslavement, the self-abnegation of the women of today, much as we now look back with wonder and with pity upon the history of the "cave-dwellers," as revealed by archaeologic researches.

I oppose marriage because marriage is a yoke, and because the yoke is unequal, putting the heavier end upon the neck of the weaker yoke-fellow. Marriage is conjugality, and conjugality means being yoked together. Juga means a "yoke," and whenever the ancient Romans subdued an enemy they made the conquered to literally and really "pass under the yoke," to show to them that henceforth they were not free, but the slaves of the Roman people. When a woman marries she passes under the yoke, the yoke of marital bondage. The word "marital" comes from mari, the "husband," to indicate that marriage is man's institution—made for man's convenience and benefit, not or woman's.

The history of marriage shows this. The Jewish Decalogue extolled even by many Freethinkers, puts the wife among her husband's chattels. The Christian canon law, founded on the sayings of Jesus and of Paul does not put woman and man equally under the yoke. Shakespeare is noted for the fidelity with which he paints man and his institutions, and in "The Taming of the Shrew" he gives correctly the status of woman in his time, under Christian marriage, when he makes Petruchio to say,

> I will be master of what is my own:
> She is my goods, my chattels; she is my house,
> My household stuff, my field, my barn,
> My horse, my ox, my ass, my anything;
> And here she stands, touch her who ever dare.

And Katharina endorses what her husband says when she thus lectures rebellious wives:

> Thy husband is thy lord, thy life, thy keeper,
> Thy head, thy sovereign; one that cares for thee,
> And for thy maintenance; commits his body
> To painful labor, both by sea and land;
> To watch the night in storms, the day in cold,
> While thou liest warm at home, secure and safe;
> And craves no other tribute at thy hands,
> But love, fair looks, and true obedience;—
> Too little payment for so great a debt.
> Such duty as a subject owes a prince,
> Even such a woman oweth to her husband;
> . . . . When they are bound to serve, love and obey.

And much more of the same tenor. All this is in full accord with canon law, as we have it today, built upon the sayings of Paul and of Jesus, who never put woman on equality with man; and therefore I oppose marriage because—admitting bondage to be necessary it is not right that bondage should be unequal. It is not right that the individuality of woman should be merged in that of man. Admitting that husband and wife should be one it is not right that the husband alone should be that one.

Those who may wish to know what marriage has done, and is now doing, for woman and her children, should read "Woman, Church and State," by Matilda Joslyn Gage.

I oppose marriage because I believe, with Col. Ingersoll,—see his lecture, "Liberty for Man, Woman and Child," that the "unit of good government is the family," or that the family is the type and basis of government, of the "community," the state, or the nation. I recognize that the government of the United States is exclusive, jealous, partialistic, narrowly selfish, despotic, invasive, paternalistic, monopolistic, and cruel—logically and legitimately so because the unit and basis of that government is the family whose chief corner stone is institutional marriage.

I oppose marriage because I believe it to be the "Bastile," the last refuge and fortress, or stronghold, in, by and through which Ecclesiasticism hopes to perpetuate its power over mankind. All ecclesiastic organizations or nearly all, are now clamoring for more laws limiting divorce, thereby holding the oppressed and abused wives to their "duty" as breeders of the "anit," breeders of the poorly endowed,—those who, like their mothers, will not have spirit enough to rebel against tyranny, and will be content with the lot in life "to which it has pleased God to call them."

I oppose marriage because the despotic and invasive "state" joins hands with the church to uphold and perpetuate its "peculiar institution," canon law marriage. Hence the statutes against the dissemination of knowledge in regard to sex, and in regard to "prevention of conception," which would lead to limitation of families, thereby depriving both state and church of their needful supply of submissive slaves. Church and state are Siamese twins, so inseparably connected that whatever threatens the life of one threatens the life of the other, and they both recognize that free motherhood—the abolition of marriage—would mean, in time, the abolition of both church and state.

Several other points need elaboration, and may possibly receive attention next week.

H. L. Green on Marriage.

In "Free Thought Magazine."

After we published our editorial on the Putnam-Collins tragedy in the January Magazine complaints came to us from a number of quarters that we had misrepresented the Free Love doctrine, and Moses Harman requested that he might have a hearing on the subject through the pages of this Magazine. Knowing Mr. Harman to be the editor and publisher of Lucifer, the organ of the Free Lovers in this country, and one of the ablest disciples of Freeloveism, and withal an honest, conscientious man, who has the courage to put his Free Love theories to practice in his own family, we decided it would be but justice to the Free Lovers, seeing that we had criticised their opinions, to allow Mr. Harman, as their representative, to give their version of what Free Love is in our pages. Besides, we hold, as a cardinal doctrine, that no class of believers should be condemned until they themselves have a fair opportunity to present their doctrines from their own standpoint, and by their ablest representative. This is the theory of true Liberalism in contradistinction to Orthodoxy. We care not how odious an opinion may seem to be at first sight, its advocates should be granted a fair, honorable hearing before they are condemned for advocating them.

Mr. Harman's article, under the title "A Free Lover's Creed," appears on another page of this number of the Magazine, and we request each of our readers to peruse it carefully, as it is probably the very best that can be said in behalf of the Free Love theory.

We promised Mr. Harman that we would reply to his article in the same number of the Magazine in which it appeared, but since reading it we hardly think any reply is necessary. As Brother Moore, of the "Blue Grass Blade," often says, it seems 'most impossible to get a Free Lover to set forth plainly what his views are on the marriage question. We notice that Brother Harman has that defect, but after all, we think the intelligent readers of the Magazine can pretty plainly see through his eloquently presented sophisms and get to Mr. Harman's real opinions, that seem to be about this: That there should be no marriage laws whatever, that men and women should be allowed to cohabit together, miscellaneously, as their judgment, feeling and inclinations may dictate. That men should be at liberty at any time to choose who shall be the mother of their children, and that women should freely choose the father of the children they desire to have. That there should be no restraint whatever as to parentage in the business of rearing children. After you go down through Brother Harman's panegyrics on Liberty and Fraternity and his denunciations of marriage Slavery, we are sure you will perceive his ideas as to marriage are about what we have above indicated. Of course Brother Harman, knowing that he was writing his article for a publication read by people who take no stock in his Free Love views, has dressed them up in as attractive a garb as possible. But when he writes for his own journal, Lucifer, he is not so careful. In his issue of February 24th on the 2d page, one "Carrie L— of Oregon" asks for a little information as to the meaning of something stated in "Motherhood in Freedom," a book recently written and published by Mr. Harman. To this inquiry Mr. Harman replies editorially:

"The idea elucidated in 'Motherhood in Freedom' is that a woman should be free to choose the best conditions available when she wishes to become a mother. This includes her right to choose a man other than her husband, if she considers that other man better fitted mentally and physically for fatherhood.

"Such choice is necessarily conditional on the willingness of the man she prefers. For instance, a woman may live with and love a man who is consumptive or scrofulous, and thereby unfitted for fatherhood. She may be physically able to bear, and both may intensely desire a child. Now, conventional morality would say that she must bear a child by her husband or remain childless as long as he shall live."

It will be noticed that Brother Harman is a little more specific here than in his article. As the saying is, he "lets the cat out of the bag" in writing to Sister Carrie. Let us look at this theory for a moment. Brother Harman, of course, holds to equal rights for both men and women. Therefore, if a man's wife is physically broken down on account of bearing and raising children and possibly taking in washing or doing other labor in support of a lazy husband, and he decides that he needs another child, he shall be permitted to call on one of the neighboring women who is in good health, without consulting her husband or any one else, to mother his child. On the other hand a husband, by exposure to the inclemency of the weather, in his legitimate occupation, has caught a severe cold that settles on his lungs, which results in consumption, and thereafter his wife concludes that it is best to increase the number of her offspring, and in this matter, to guard against her husband's consumptive germs, she calls upon her neighbor Brown, requesting him to officiate. When the inhabitants of a whole neighborhood, or of a whole State, practice that kind of "moral philosophy," what kind of civilization will we have? We will admit it would do away with the kind of prostitution that now infests our large towns and cities, in the same manner it would destroy our rum shops to allow everybody to sell liquor without a license or permit.

As Mr. Harman has stated his views of marriage, we will close this article by presenting our views.

We hold that marriage is the most important and the most sacred contract that human beings can enter into—that it is the most sacred, not because of the Adam and Eve myth story in the mythical garden of Eden, but because it is founded upon the everlasting laws of nature, and has been proved by experience to have produced the greatest amount of happiness of any institution of the world.

We so highly prize this institution that in place of destroying it, as Brother Harman and his Free Love friends are trying to do, we would have the government protect and guard it and improve it in every possible way by legislation and otherwise.

We believe that in all our schools there should be teachers well qualified to teach the students those things that would prepare them for good husbands and good wives, good fathers and good mothers. That, in fact, everything should be done that is possible to do to fit young people for this most important institution.

Young people should be taught to look upon marriage as a life-long institution and to bend all their energies after marriage to make their companion prosperous, joyful, happy and contented. In other words, as before stated, in place of trying to destroy the marriage institution we should do all in our power to improve it.

The above are our ideas of marriage, not clothed in such beautiful and persuasive language as are Brother Harman's views, but we are willing to submit them, side by side with those of our Free Love friend, and ask the reader to decide which, in his or her opinion, when put to practice, will produce the most complete civilization, and be productive of the greatest happiness?

REMARKS.

Whether Mr. Green's reply to my article is couched in the language of fairness, and whether his interpretation of my "real opinions" as seen by himself in what he is pleased to call my "eloquently presented sophisms," is a truthful interpretation or not I leave the readers of Lucifer to judge.

As to the quotation from Lillian Harman's reply to Mrs. Larson, in Lucifer of Feb. 24,—which quotation Mr. Green says "lets the cat out of the bag," I would just say that if I had been writing the reply in question—which Mr. Green must have seen was not an "editorial," nor printed as such—I would have said something like this:

The idea constantly presented in the pamphlet, "Motherhood in Freedom," is that woman should be free, and therefore she would never have to choose between her husband and some other man for paternity of her prospective child. No woman who acknowledges "husband's rights" can claim to be a free woman. With this exception I endorse what my daughter said in the reply referred to.

"Brother Harman, of course, holds to equal rights for both men and women," says Brother Green. Yes, and because I hold to equal rights I object to marriage ownership. Man has the unquestioned right to self-ownership, and this is all that woman can rightfully ask, and she should be content with nothing else. Self-ownership is the only basis on which equality of rights of the sexes is possible. Reciprocal ownership—or equal ownership of each other's persons, is simply an impossibility, since nature has made woman and man with very unequal powers and functions, so far as reproduction is concerned.

"If a man's wife is physically broken down . . . . in support of a lazy husband, and he decides that he should have another child," queries my critic. Under equal freedom there can be no trouble in a case like this. If man decides that he needs one or more children there should be no law to prevent him having all he wants—all his organism will produce, but to demand that some woman's organism shall be made to produce a child or children for him—whether that woman be called his wife or not, is quite a different matter. It is a maxim in economic equities that to the worker belongs the product of his or her labor. Then if a woman conceives, gestates, builds and gives birth to a child that child is hers "against the world." And so also of man. Whenever he conceives, gestates, builds and gives birth to a child that child is his against the world. In this way, and in this way only, can any man rightfully and truly become the owner of a child, except it be by gift or purchase from the real owner, the mother; and it is an open question whether a woman has the moral right to give away or sell her child. The old idea that paternity, or the fact of fertilization of the human ovum, confers rights of ownership upon man, is one of the superstitions of our ignorant and brutal ancestors, which superstition modern Freethinkers should be ashamed to acknowledge belief in,—as it seems to me.

Yes, Brother Green, I plead guilty to the charge of demanding for woman the right to refuse to bear a child for a consumptive husband, a scrofulous or epileptic husband. I claim that a woman who does this, when a better fatherhood is possible, commits a crime against her child, an unpardonable crime.

If this be treason, let the editor of the "Free Thought Magazine," and his brother reactionists, make the most of it.

Lucifer stands for more liberty, as the cure for the evils of our social system. The "Free Thought Magazine" stands for more law, and would compel women to submit to, and be sexually "true" to, a diseased or otherwise unwelcome husband, in obedience to the demands of a priest-made and anti-natural institution.

The chief point in Brother Green's reply is that I am uncandid, that I deal in "sophisms," which Webster says mean wilful deception. To prove this he has been compelled to misrepresent me. The "moral" of this is that he who accuses another should be careful lest it be shown that his accusation is simply the reflex action, or the subjective picture of his own mental status. Hence the wisdom of the old injunction, "Judge not," etc.

To show that Mr. Green misrepresents me I will send free to any applicant a copy of Lucifer Feb. 24, containing the reference to "Motherhood in Freedom," and to all who want to know what I have said on the question of free motherhood, as against marriage slavery, I will send the pamphlet itself for three two cent stamps, and if this is too much to pay I will send it free, post paid, to any earnest truth-seeker.

In closing will just say that the "monogamy," spoken of in my article reprinted in this issue, is the voluntary sex-companionship of two persons, a woman and a man, and has nothing whatever to do with institutional marriage.

"Bruno, the flames that 'round thy body curled
After thy taunt was at thy tyrants hurled,
Gleam through the years and make thy name adored."

VARIOUS VOICES.

Ella Slater, Kan.:—I will enclose twenty-five cents for which please send your "Light Bearer" until the time paid for expires and then I hope to have one dollar ready to send you for one year's subscription. A friend who takes your paper kindly sent me the papers commencing with the first chapter of "Hilda's Home," and all the reading is so good and is just the right kind of education for old and young, that as I have a daughter just coming into womanhood I am very anxious for her to read Lucifer, and we both are anxious for the rest of the story. My daughter said to me since reading "Hilda's Home," "Mamma, I never will marry." I will not tell her not to marry but I will educate her so that she will not want to marry but will live happier, I hope, than most married women live.

Mrs. T——. J——., La.:—Your paper duly received. Your publications appeal to me very strongly. My one regret is that in this section I stand practically alone. I have never had the courage to express my opinion to any one here except my husband and a very dear sister, both of whom are freethinkers; but neither of them agree with me.

I enjoyed the paper you sent me. Your comments on "Love Ideals" are especially happy. I shall preserve them. J. Wm. Lloyd's "New Love Ideal," I have read and re-read with intense interest.

I inclose fifty cents for list of books and papers. I wish I could help you in your noble work, but poverty, as well as the lack of my husband's support and sympathy, debar me now. Yet I live in hope.

I have seen so much of the evil effects of the present social system, that I am sure there is a better way. While man has every liberty so many thousand women, good and true, are denied those crowning joys of woman's life, love and motherhood. Also many more suffer equally in uncongenial marriage, while untold thousands are sacrificed every year to this Moloch of conventionalism—Monogamy, or Virtue, which shall we call it? I am beginning to fear they are in truth sacrificed to keep their sisters in slavery.

Please wrap the literature you send me so securely that no part of it may become exposed during transit here. I live in a very orthodox community, mostly Catholic, and I hope in time to get a position here in the schools; therefore I have to be very careful. Ah! how much it would enhance my happiness to be able like yourself to boldly proclaim these portentous truths to an awakening world.

Mattie E. Hursen, Battle Creek, Mich.:—I have re-read J. Wm. Lloyd's article, and observation and limited experience bear me out in saying I believe he has struck the key note of harmony, which means health and happiness for the human race. I have witnessed cases of what he calls the "centripetal extreme" and have seen the direful results of such intense love, and wondered why such results should follow in the wake of what the world called good; and have asked myself the question, was it good? Was it not a diseased condition of the nerves, etc., etc.? In my own case, never having felt the "grand passion," never having had the "soul mate"—"heart comrade" I have never been free from that "vague unrest, a thirst unquenched," in fact a longing for something I know not what, as though there was a something lacking in my life.

Then again I have known wives who were really happily mated, chafe under the restraints laid upon them by husband and society, because they could not have the freedom to admire what was admirable in other men, and later on get all out of harmony with home and husband and finally do what the world calls a disreputable act. They would be criticized thusly, "Why did she do such a thing?" "She had such a nice husband, and such a good home." "Yes, and she had all the nice clothes she wanted, and what more does a woman want?"

Then I call to mind a family where I lived for four months, the most harmonious family I ever met, with two of the sweetest children who never disagreed, but loved each other dearly and played together like kittens. I called out the confidence of both husband and wife, neither knowing about the other, each told of the great love and confidence they placed in the other, each condemning self because having a lover outside, and feeling that each was doing the other a great wrong. The man said to me in one of his confidential talks, when his wife was away, "Why do I do this? Can you tell me? I can't help it; this attraction is stronger than I can resist, and the worst of it all is, I do not want to resist it."

In like manner the wife with tears in her eyes criminated herself, saying, "W—— is one of the best men in the world, and the children are all I could desire, and I have everything heart can wish for, as far as lies in my husband's power, but this pulling at my heart-strings that takes me to this other man I cannot understand. Why must it be so?" Then she says, "Instead of being sorry after I get home I am happy in the thoughts of it, and am brighter and better to W——, and love my children better. What is the meaning of this? Can you tell me?" My answer to them both was, "No, I do not know, how I wish I did."

While I was there in that loving, harmonious atmosphere, instead of being happy in their happiness that "vague unrest" took such strong hold of me that I wanted to get away and do battle with the cruel, wicked world again. Then, Mr. Harman, if I could only tell you of the wives who have talked to me of the association with their husbands as "nasty," "dirty," "vulgar," "beastly," "vile," and say they felt like vomiting after it, etc., I tell you it would fill a volume.

Then while dressmaking in a city of Michigan I did lots of work for prostitutes, and called out the confidence of a great many of them, and they all, or nearly all, have this feeling of nastiness, and only one of all I ever talked with but said they had got into it through the lies of some man and their own trusting love nature; not through being born depraved. The one exception was a beautiful girl who told me her father was a fast man, a woman's man, using her own words, "and I am my father's own girl. I am here for no reason only the love of it, and unlike the rest of the girls in the house I can leave when ever I get ready. To my folks at home and my friends I am away on a visit to school girl friends in other cities; when I begin to get tired of this I shall go home and be respectable. Yes; when I get ready I shall marry a 'respectable' young man in 'our set' and he never will be the wiser; but never you fear about my cheating him any. While I am here in a fast house he is visiting fast houses at home, but you know I couldn't do that and maintain my respectability."

I could go on duplicating these experiences till they run into the dozens, but it is useless. I have pondered much over these things and wondered at the why of it, but never till reading Lloyd's article got any scientific explanation therefor. Now if this great Centripetal and Centrifugal force, or in other words, the law of attraction and repulsion, is the force that holds planets true to their center of attraction, and we are taught that it is, why then should it not be a law that holds good through the whole universe of matter? And if it be, then why should it not act its part in the life forces of the human family? Can you answer me these questions?

The New Calvary.

Ah! it was easy when the world was young
To keep one's life free and inviolate,
From our sad lips another song is wrung,
By our own hands our heads are desecrate,
Wanderers in drear exile, and dispossessed
Of what should be our own, we can but feed on wild unrest.

Somehow the grace, the bloom of things has flown,
And of all men we are most wretched who Must live each other's lives and not our own
For very pity's sake and then undo
And that we live for—it was otherwise
When soul and body seemed to blend in mystic symphonies.

But we have left those gentle haunts to pass
With weary feet to the new Calvary,
Where we behold, as one who in a glass
Sees his own face, self-slain Humanity,
And in the dumb reproach of that sad gaze
Learn what an awful phantom the red hand of man can raise.

Glimmerings of the Dawn.

BY JAMES S. DENSON.

The way our masters spend our money to no good purpose is shown in this editorial paragraph from the New York "Journal," and the paragraph shows also that now and then an editor gets a glimmering of light and lets the world have the benefit of it:

Secretary Morton has issued an exhaustive report on "The Tapeworm of Poultry." It is profusely illustrated and represents the work of several of Mr. Morton's high-priced experts. The value of this production may be measured by the announcement in the closing chapter that these special insects of the poultry yard are harmless. In one respect they are different from the Agricultural department. This institution squanders public money with a recklessness that shows it to be anything but harmless.

Bruce Price, president of the Municipal Art Society, of New York, comments very pungently on Revivalist Moody's late onslaught on art. Mr. Price says: "Mr. Moody's attack on art is what might be expected from a man who has been living in the valley all his life. In the valley he sees very little. He is down in a fog, while we admirers of art are climbing to the hill-tops where we can survey the surrounding country." That is neatly said. Moody has always been plodding along in the valleys of superstition. Hemmed in his own little vale of antiquated dogma he fancies that everything outside is "heathen." He is as provincial as any villager who has never been outside his native township.

Another rebuke for the anti-human Moody, who thinks his body without clothes would be rank poison to the morals of the beholder! F. Miranda, president of the American Sculpture Society, thus pays his respects to the ascetic:

"My son, who is now thirteen, is just as familiar with the human form in the nude as I am myself. I do not keep him out of my studio. He comes here at all times, and is being educated to see nothing immodest in a nude figure of man or woman."

There is enough common sense in the words and the work of President Miranda to make him worthy of a monument of the most enduring granite. He is a true educator.

In the debate in the House of Representatives on the Immigration bill, one section of which bars out all intending immigrants who cannot speak the language of the country of which they have been resident, a section which was admittedly aimed at the Russian Jew, Mr. Bartholdt said:

"If in this dawn of the twentieth century my constituents should ask me to join in further persecution of them, I would lay down my duties here, return to my sanctum and write editorials against such an inhuman proposition."

The office-holder who will give up his position rather than do an injustice is so rare that Mr. Bartholdt's brave words deserve more than a fleeting recognition. The proposed law would separate husbands and wives, brothers and sisters, and parents and children.

A recent example of pig-headed stupidity in the administration of federal affairs is appropriately exposed by the "Journal" of New York, as follows:

"There were numerous applicants for the position of translator of modern languages in the Adjutant-General's office, which had become vacant from the promotion of its incumbent to a chair in the faculty of Columbian University. The requirements of the position exact thorough acquaintance with French, German, Italian and Spanish, typewriting in these languages, experience in proof reading and preparing manuscript for the press, knowledge of cataloguing and indexing books as practised in the best libraries, and an adequate command of military history and the technique of the military profession. Among the duties exacted is the translation of foreign military works of importance—by no means an easy task of its kind. A woman carried off the palm magnificently, and, in spite of the urgent recommendation of the examining board, the great Mikado of the office says No. A woman is good to dance and flirt with young officers, good to breed food for gunpowder, but not good to fill any salaried office in the army, even of a pacific and purely intellectual sort, in spite of the triumphant fitness which has asserted itself over the sterner sex."

J. William Lloyd, in his new work, "The Red Heart in a White World," says in a foot-note:

"The governing spirit, operating along another line [other than the political] led to government in another form. Imagination, dreams, visions, clairvoyance, prophecy, magnetism, hypnotism, constitute a group of phenomena still not understood. In primitive life individuals strongly expressing such phenomena were flattered by the wonder and reverence of their fellows, and were tempted, and easily came to assume commission to control the mental life. From this germ grew the priesthood, which in its original form always tended to absorb art, science, and philosophy, and even when any branch separated it inclined to form a minor priesthood, as, for example, medicine, schools of art, thought, etc. The tendency and characteristic of a priesthood is to limit and petrify thought and ally with political tyranny. The antidote is a liberal, judicial, tolerant skepticism."

Two thoughts are to be emphasized here—Mr. Lloyd has expressed both—all differentiations of the original priesthood partake of the character of the parent, and all these minor priesthoods seek to ally themselves with the state. The most powerful and the most invasive of the new priesthoods is that of medicine, as our statute books and the resolutions adopted by medical associations bear ample evidence.

The special commissioner of the New York "Journal "sent by that paper to gather the facts concerning the revolt in the Philippine Islands against Spanish rule, thus sums up the result of his discoveries:

It is the old, old story of Spanish conquest and cruelty, the rulers of the many islands of which Manila is the capital having changed little in their customs or characteristics since Magellan left them in possession, or Cortez won and lost Mexico to the flag of the Ferdinands. While in Europe and America civilization has progressed and developed, in the far East it has remained stationary, the church and the state governing in conjunction, and the Archbishop the Governor's superior, and the tortures of the Inquisition still well known from not infrequent application.

Not only did the persecuting church destroy the civilization of Spain by murdering or banishing its thinkers and its doers, but it killed the hopes of the succeeding generations when it sent away or tortured to death those who should have been the transmitters to them of selected blood. Not only was Spain cursed, but all her colonies, and the entire world was grievously wounded. It is an augury of hope when a newspaper with an immense circulation among the poorly-instructed masses dares print these truths. The lesson for us is that variations should be encouraged, not destroyed.

The Limitation of Population, and Woman's Freedom.

BY ELSIE COLE-WILCOX.

Permit me to express my hearty approbation of your reply to Mrs. Waisbrooker in Lucifer No. 651. I consider you right in every particular regarding the best and surest means to break down plutocratic rule.

What can a woman do toward emancipating herself or the race, if she must be eternally tied to a cradle? She can do nothing but drudge, and rear another generation of slaves to bear the plutocratic yoke.

That conditions should exist which make contraception an economic necessity is an outrage, I freely admit. But so long as they do exist it is worse than folly to try to ignore them. And the spirit of mercy, nay, of justice should prompt us to be careful how we force human beings into the world under conditions that make their lives a burden to them.

If these children could be born with the instincts of freedom so firmly implanted in their natures that they would rebel against the degrading conditions into which they are born, and carve their own way to freedom it might be different. But we have no reason to believe they will do so. On the contrary, they will go on as their ancestors have done, and continue to propagate slaves for the millionaires.

By limiting the number of our offspring we give ourselves more time and opportunities to work for the enlightenment of those we do have, and of others, also, whose parents do not see the necessity of such enlightenment. And to me, it appears a manifest injustice to the unborn, to force them into a martyrdom for which they may be entirely unfitted. And I have long wanted to protest against the assumption on the part of so many of our writers on sex reforms that there would be no use for contraceptics if women were free from man's invasion. It seems to me that anyone who has an insight into the real nature of woman will readily see the fallacy of such an argument.

These writers seem to take it for granted that women are devoid of sexual passion, and would never desire sex union except when they desired offspring. No doubt it is true that many women are thus deformed, or deficient in the attributes of their sex. But I fancy the great majority are not. Ages of repression on the part of women, in obedience to religious and "grundious" teaching has weakened woman sexually until she is no longer man's equal in that respect. But if free to consult her own needs and desires she would soon recover much of her lost vigor.

And even now, the great majority of women would not be content to live without sex intercourse except on the very rare occasions when children were desired.

I would not go to quite the extreme, though, suggested by Lois, and "kill the man" if I could not get away from him. Still I would uphold a woman in repelling invasion, at all hazards. But it is a mistake to suppose that contraceptics are not often mutually desired by true and loving pairs who do not, at the time, desire offspring.

The world may outgrow such inventions some day, but the time is not yet. In the meantime our senseless laws which forbid all knowledge of such things should be repealed, or disregarded and the best possible methods should be studied and given to the public, as freely as knowledge of hygiene.

Marriage—The "Freethinker's" God.

[The following is part of the reply of N. C. Mathers of Wichita, Kansas, to his critics who have censured him for his championship of Lucifer. A prominent member of the Freethought organization of that city had asked him this question. "Excepting Lillian Harman, and a very few intellectual people, would you associate with a woman who ignored the rite of marriage and the customs of society, and was raising a family of children on the free love plan? I would; but would you?" Mr. Mathers replies as follows:]

I will answer that by first asking you if you would associate with such "vile," "base," "immoral," people as all infidels are said to be? People who ignore the very existence of "our creater" and deny the divinity of "our Savior"? No, I am sure you would not associate with any such people as that, except Ingersoll "and a very few intellectual" people of his stamp.

No, Mr. M., we would not associate with people who prostitute a noble cause to the gratification of their sensual passions, but we would associate with people who understand and appreciate the aims at reform that that cause advocates and hopes to bring about; but not if they preach reform and practice orthodox prostitution.

Orthodox people link prostitution and all kinds of immorality and crime with "infidelity," when in fact these crimes and vices are only the outgrowth of orthodoxy. They class ignorant scoffers with enlightened freethinkers, and liberals make the same mistake concerning the advocates of social reforms.

The ignorant or dishonest self-styled freethinkers, who link "free love and whiskey" together are very little superior to the orthodox saloon-keeper, gambler or prostitute who are not "Christians" themselves, but want their children to be. And they'll all fight for Jesus at the drop of a hat.

You say, "When we have freed people from a much larger share of superstition we may with some hope of success attempt sexual reforms."

You mean to say, After we have pounded away at the snake's tail a few generations longer we may then with safety gradually work up toward its head, and give that a whack or two.

I think so long as people breed children in such large quantities and of such poor quality it will be a slow and thankless task trying to free them from their superstitions.

You can not free the camel of its hump so long as you continue to breed it with its kind. Those superstitions have stuck to mankind, and will continue to stick to them so long as they hold to the old superstitious ideas concerning the sacredness or divinity of the marriage rite, or rights. That superstitious idea is harder to break down than is the God idea, and it is just as fallacious and more detrimental to human progress.

The marriage rite is the "Freethinker's" God. The marriage rite is as much a product of the priesthood as baptism is. It is simply another form of selling indulgences by the priest.

People who denounce free love, as some of those writers did in the "Free Thought Magazine," have only had a passing glimpse of the freethought field through the cracks of the orthodox fence that their fathers have built around it.

The great question of the day is, "What shall we do to be saved?" and "verily verily I say unto you," read Lucifer.

Population and Economics.

BY LILLIE D. WHITE.

Mr. Harman "avoids personalities as much as possible," but evidently the possibility did not exist in the editorial under discussion in 640. "When woman's sense of responsibility to the unborn is fully awakened she will not bring children into the world until conditions are provided that will give to each a place at nature's table" might have been intended for women in general, but the lines following, "such conditions as will not require the discontinuance of the favorite family paper in order that all may have bread" must have had reference to the parent who had requested Lucifer stopped because the choice of bread or Lucifer had to be made.

This looked to me like a reckless hit, because it was made on the head of an unoffending person for if the parents of a fine family of loving happy children, intelligent enough to read Lucifer, whose love was proved by their sacrifice, well enough off, I infer, to have brought their children pretty well along toward years of maturity—are not fit progenitors of the race where under the sun shall we find proper parentage?

That class of parents deserve great credit for having all the children they possibly can have. It is from that class that we may expect the energy and strength, the life that sometime will break the bonds that fetter us, burst through the shell of oppression and injustice that surrounds us.

Nothing but life, a great flow of abundant over-flowing life will do this. To destroy, to annihilate to check life destroys the means of our salvation.

I do not object to individual mothers limiting their families to suit the income—on the same principle that I would not advise them to spend their little money on beautiful pictures or books or pleasures that they long for, that they have a right to and ought to know—but that such restriction is a remedy for economic evils is just as absurd and impossible as that the denial of books and pictures could be a remedy.

I have always advocated woman's freedom in motherhood with reference to herself only, not as to its effect on society or the race. In fact if the perpetuation of the race is a good thing we owe untold gratitude to unwilling mothers for so far the world has mostly been populated by them. I call Mrs. Russell's attention to this. I fear she has given a wrong meaning to my words formerly.

If Mr. Harman's suggestion that "woman should not bring children into the world until conditions" etc., were acted upon it would simply wipe out of existence the wage earners of the world, for no parent depending upon wages—upon a place to toil granted by a master—has any assurance whatever that he or she can provide for the helpless years of the childhood of a family. And if his strike could be inaugurated and not another child be born for twenty-five years, I see no reason to believe that the world would be in any better condition to receive them then than it is now so far as the effects of their absence is concerned.

In my opinion the labor problem is helped toward solution by every accession to the ranks of toilers. Every year of "hard times" augments the army from the middle class who are squeezed out by the millionaire's mill. Improved machinery adds its thousands every year. All these are welcomed by the philosophical labor reformer. New life must come to replace the old.

If there were an actual scarcity of honey Mr. Harman's argument drawn from the bees might be a good one; but there is not, every working bee comes into the world with ability to produce all the honey he needs himself and more. The queen bee never restricts or starves her progeny for the sake of storing up honey for the drones. The restriction begins in quite another quarter and is carried out in a decisive and effective manner, and the greater the number of bees the neater and quicker the job is done.

To me the fear of over population is so groundless that I regret while I am amused to see the concern displayed by Mr Harman and Mr. Coolridge. Mr. Harman refers to that remarkable freak of fecundity in a way that seems to say: "See what we are coming to if mothers go on unchecked in their head-long career toward multitudinous maternity."

Mr. Coolridge thinks if "every woman has as many children as she may wish to have" it is equivalent to "increasing the number of sufferers."

Willing mothers do not increase sufferers. The suffering is caused by the exploitation of the honey made by the working bees—these children—into the millionaire's hive.

As a matter of fact Mr. Harman and Mr. Coolridge have every reason to be thankful that the theory they advocate is working out so well.

Women are not, by any means, tumbling over each other in eagerness to imitate the example of prolificness in Lucifer 650.

Large families are comparatively rare nowadays. On every hand we find young men who refrain from marriage because they know that industry and skill do not give assurance of ability to provide "places at nature's table." Young women refuse to marry for various reasons. The wives of working men are moving heaven and earth, so to speak, in their frantic endeavors to limit the family to the possibilities of a scanty and constantly lowering income. They grasp eagerly at any knowledge of contraceptics, preventives, methods of abortion, anything, everything to lower the cost of living. Thus adapting themselves to the millionaires' regime that stores the honey of the working bees in the hives of the drones. All this has a tendency to eliminate from human nature the parental instinct and desire that lovers of the race think so important. I too "avoid personalities as much as possible," and hope I have not transgressed this rule.

REMARKS.

I may not be a "philosophical labor reformer," but I still insist that it is the quality of population rather than the quantity that will bring "salvation" from plutocratic rule. The more "life" we have of the lower types the more easy it will be for the slave-holding class to perpetuate its power by pitting the slaves against each other. It is only the strong, the intelligent, the self-reliant, the self-respecting men who can be relied on to bring salvation for themselves and their fellow toilers, and such men as these are not born of submissive, improvident mothers.

The mother bee does not store honey at all, nor does she portion it out to her offspring, but being herself free and strong, self-reliant and provident, she produces a race of workers who will not become slaves to drones. The human mother is not free nor strong, self-reliant nor self-respecting, and her offspring are—like unto herself! An important difference. When will the human mother go to the bee, "consider her ways and be wise."

Most of the points brought forward by Mrs. White are sufficiently answered by Mrs. Wilcox and Mr. Coolridge in this week's Lucifer, and the rest seem to me to be self-refuting. At all events we have no further space for answer in this week's issue.

Fiat Money.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

As Mr. Hutcheson, in No. 650, does not use the term "fiat money" precisely as I do, it becomes necessary for me to explain what I mean by it. Money is "fiat money" just so far as its exchangeable value independent of legislation falls short of its exchangeable value in consequence of legislation. Our silver dollar would be about one half fiat, were it not redeemable in debts due to the goverment.

I cannot believe that brother Hutcheson has so little appreciation of free speech as to think that a free expression of opinions needs an apology in a free paper; especially as he has not apologized for what he has written.

E. C. WALKER writes us that "Comstock is beaten in the 'Triumph of Death' matter." To anyone wanting to see what all the trouble was about, we will send the book, D'Annunzio's "The Triumph of Death," cloth binding, fine paper, at publisher's price, $1.50.

The Outlook—Suspension of the Magazine.

The April number of the quarterly magazine, "Our New Humanity" is nearing completion but will not be ready for distribution so soon as expected, because of our inability to hire the needed help. The "Prosperity" promised by the Republican managers has seriously crippled all kinds of business, except it be the office-holding business, the interest-taking and rent gathering business.

Especially hard is this prosperity upon the business of publishing reform journals. Even such journals as the old and well-established "Truth Seeker" of New York have felt themselves compelled to call upon their friends for special help to tide them over the crisis.

Lucifer and "Our New Humanity" have made no such appeal, and, as our friends know, they are not backed by a "sustaining fund," an "indemnity fund" or "guarantee fund," nor by political or other influence, such as are possessed by reform journals in other lines. An instance of this is the paper called "Light of Truth" of Columbus, Ohio, which paper in a late issue made the statement that in the past seven or eight years it had been aided by a liberal minded friend to the amount of some thirty thousand dollars. Many private fortunes have been sunk in the effort to establish and keep alive papers that advocate political and economic reforms. Col. Norton of this city, editor and publisher of the Chicago "Sentinel" is reported to have said that he has sunk more than twenty thousand dollars, of his own money in the business of publishing reform literature in his line. From many other publishers come the same or similar statements.

A few words by way of retrospect may not be here amiss. When the publication of a quarterly magazine, in connection with Lucifer's work, was first decided upon the financial outlook was very different from what it is now. That was before the last of the great "financial conspiracies," the conspiracy of plutocracy against productive labor known as the single standard, or the gold standard conspiracy—before this crime of crimes had culminated in the election of William McKinley as king of the United States of America.

Within the past year Lucifer has made an expensive move from Topeka, Kansas, to Chicago, and has paid some hundreds of dollars of old debts—not legally collectible debts but debt of honor, debts owed to persons who had assisted us in time of special need.

The patrons of Lucifer and "Our New Humanity" are not of the wealthy classes. They are not of those who hold bank accounts, or who are in receipt of rents, interest, salaries or dividends, and consequently the financial pressure bears specially hard upon them. They are not of the privileged classes, else they would not patronize journals whose object is to destroy privilege. Hence instead of asking them for donations of aid we decided to economize by letting "Our New Humanity" sleep awhile, and meantime concentrate our energies upon Lucifer alone.

We have a good supply of the seven numbers of the magazine already published, including the forth-coming April number. These can still be used to assist and supplement the work of the weekly Lucifer, and when circumstances shall seem to justify we hope to resume the publication of "Our New Humanity."

If any who have paid ahead on the magazine are not satisfied with this statement we will return their money as soon as possible, or credit them on Lucifer, or send other literature published or sold by us.

WHAT THE YOUNG SHOULD KNOW.

By far the longest article of the April magazine bears this title, and is now being put into pamphlet form. It will make a pamphlet of some forty or more pages, and will be sold at ten cents per copy.

For many years the Freethought public has been calling for a book of small dimensions suitable to be put into the hands of learners both young and old, and it is believed that Mr. Walker has succeeded in the difficult task of writing the much needed and much called for pamphlet. We are printing a large edition in the hope of receiving many orders. Those who buy to sell again will be given liberal discount from retail price.

Freedom and Love, versus Marriage and Hate.

One of the chief reasons why I oppose marriage is that marriage sets up a false standard of Purity or of Virtue in the most important of all human relations,—that of sex, and especially because I regard this standard false and hurtful to woman and to her children.

Marriage, or marriage law, says, in effect, to woman:

"Your purity, your virtue, consists in this, that until you are married you must associate sexually with no man; and after you are married you must associate sexually with no man but your husband. Your sex-nature is never your own, to do with it as your own judgment may see fit. Your sex power belongs first to the state, (or to the state and the church) and secondly to your husband, so long as he does not commit a crime that the state considers sufficient to absolve you from your sex-allegiance to him. No matter whether he become diseased, a hopeless consumptive, epileptic, syphilitic, impotent or paralytic, your body still belongs to him and to him only—'so long as ye both shall live!' Failure of 'love' between you and your husband does not absolve you from your 'duty' to him. Indifference, aversion, disgust, hatred, cut no figure in the matter. If your husband demand his marital rights your marriage vow, recorded on earth and in heaven, compel you to surrender your body to his wishes, no matter how destructive such surrender—in your opinion—may be to your own health, or how unjust and cruel you may think the result of such association may be to possible offspring. The consequences of such association are not for you to consider or to guard against. In this regard the wife's duty is summed up in one word,—'Obey!'"

The disastrous result of this false standard, this anti-natural standard of purity in sex-relations, are too numerous to be shown up as they deserve, in one short article. While the subjective effect upon woman herself, and also in a less degree upon man, is deplorable beyond expression, its most blighting effects fall upon the children, the helpless children born with such heritage.

As already intimated we have, in our marriage institution, all the explanation needed to account for the bad governmental and economic systems that now curse humanity, and retard the progress and happiness of the race. With woman's subjection to marriage morality we need look no further for explanations of the notorious fact that the masses of mankind are mere automatons, mere putty or clay, in the hands of their rulers and leaders,—in the hands of the parasitic classes, the narrowly selfish, the plutocratic classes, and I close this brief weekly installment of the "Free Man's Creed" by saying,

I oppose marriage—I oppose the arbitrary "single-standard" of morality in sex-relations, because I believe that no substantial progress can be made in bettering the condition of the enslaved masses of mankind so long as this anti-natural single standard is accepted as the only basis of "legal tender" in the "currency" of sex—the interchange between the sexes that creates new human beings.

The legitimate and necessary effect of the arbitrary "legal tender," gold standard, or gold basis of value in the matter of a medium of exchange in commercial affairs,—and for the payment of salaries and interest to the ruling classes, is to impoverish and enslave the masses, but this slavery is only the outgrowth and the logical sequence of the older and deeper laid conspiracy against freedom and justice known as the marriage institution, by the requirements of which the only way through which children are allowed to be produced is by a surrender of self-hood, a surrender of self-control, and submission to the arbitrary will of another, on the part of the producers of children—the mothers of mankind; and hence I repeat and would continue to repeat that the first step towards freeing mankind from the governmental ills and the societary ills of all kinds, is to free the mothers of men, and this can only be done by the abolition, or the ignoring, of institutional marriage.

More About the Population Question.

BY CYRUS W. COOLRIDGE.

Is it really true that limiting of families as proposed by Mr. Harman "would only make the present property system more endurable?"

Admitting for argument's sake that it would, what does it prove? Have we a right to make our children suffer for the purpose of proving that the present economic conditions are unjust and unbearable? Is this the safest road to the attainment of justice? It is very well to talk of the pleasure of having many children, but what about the "pleasure" of providing for six children when the parents cannot provide even for two children?

I know a man who is so poor, that to a great extent he depends upon the help of his relatives. I know as well as I know that I am alive that he is not able to support one child, and yet he has a houseful of little ones. His children have not the slightest prospect of winning in the battle of life. They will be brought up in poverty, wretchedness and ignorance. Their parents may love them, but love alone does not feed hungry mouths.

What role can such children play in the drama of life? Will they be able to help to advance the cause of industrial justice? Their lives will be an endless struggle for existence. They will consider themselves fortunate if they escape actual starvation. The chances are that they will be a burden to themselves and to others and absolutely of no use to the world at large. Tell me, then, whether it is cruel to say to the father and the mother of those children: "You had no right to bring them into existence?" If it is, what shall we say of the cruelty of the parents who recklessly furnish victims for the greedy mouth of the monster of iniquity?

I have said, and I say again, that we must do all we can to protest against the existing conditions, but I do not think that we have a right to do it at the expense of other people, or that we can accomplish anything by increasing the number of sufferers.

Dianism.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

"What do you give us in place of that complete indulgence which alone can satisfy the average man and woman? What do you mean by the little ways and tricks of Dianism?"

Thus queries a friend in commenting on my Dianistic views.

What would you give the drunkard in place of his dram? The morphine fiend in place of his drug? The mythologist in place of his beloved myths?

We offer health, happiness, purity, and ten thousand other blessings, instead of the one evil of needless sexing.

By the "little ways and tricks of Dianism," I mean the little touches, pats and caressive tokens of love. The clasp of the hand, the glance of affection, the tone of the voice, and all that speaks of genuine kindliness and friendliness; this we offer in place of the over much sexing, that is murdering millions of wives, and scattering syphilis all over the world.

Is it not worth while to be a Dianist? To exercise wisdom and be self poised, when we can thereby secure the blessings above enumerated, and abolish the evils? And also stop all abortions, and infanticides, and have none but wished for children?

There is an old saying, "No cross, no crown," but Dianism will be no cross to the rightly heredited and educated.

We do not expect all to be Dianists at once. The masses must grow slowly towards it. Every step gained makes the next one more easy to take. Conserve the life forces and not needlessly waste them in mere momentary paroxysms of pleasure.

To the garden the world new ascending
Potent mates, daughters, sons, preloading,
The love, the life of their bodies, meaning and being.

A Sensible and Just Physician.

"Lenox," in "Medical World"

The woman who marries, knowing herself physically unfit for maternity is guilty of a crime that deprives her of all claim to sympathy.—Dr. Waugh.

Women should not be punished for ignorance when the ethics of society almost entirely preclude knowledge. How is a young woman to know whether or not she is fit for maternity when usage forbids her to even think of the science of sexology except as something dreadfully bad? Your schools and colleges will instruct her in the languages and Delsarte, but all taboo the subject of procreation, notwithstanding that the defect of knowledge on that one matter may mean to her a lifetime of misery. You say she should be taught by her mother. But suppose her mother is as ignorant of sex as she? My dear sir, give us mothers that are educated on sex lines, and the coming generations will be educated. But our system of moral ethics has purposely kept the mothers in ignorance of the use and misuse of the sex functions, and then you say that suffering womanhood, under certain conditions, has no claim for sympathy. If a family physician would even suggest any word of advice to the daughter about to marry, the family would be shocked. This is not so much the fault of the doctor as it is of the social code; but the medical profession acquiesces in the outrage of misfit marriages, and lies back and accepts the fruits of post-marital miseries.

Sociologic Lesson. No. XXXVI.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

TEST OF VALUE. That the value of notes depends upon their redeemability may be easily shown by an experiment. Suppose the government should issue special notes legal tender for their face value, but redeemable in gold for twice their face value. Such notes would be accepted by merchants at a high premium; at nearly or quite their redeemable value. On the other hand, if the government should issue special notes legal tender for their face value, and redeemable for one half their face value, merchants would only receive such notes for what they could get for them, and this would fix their market value. Making the whole issue of notes of either of these classes would not affect their exchangeable value. The only difference would be that prices would be reduced when the notes became more valuable, and would be raised if notes only partially redeemable were used.

The legitimate controlling or preventing of conception should begin long before marriage; in fact before reaching a marriageable age, it should be a proper education—a knowledge of self. There is a deplorable amount of ignorance, even among the best educated and most refined as to the sexual and procreative functions of the race. The stock-breeder makes the subject a study, finds means to legitimately prevent conception with his stock until such time and under such circumstances as is of the most advantage to the improvement of his stock. He may attend a stock-breeders' association, discourse very learnedly on these important and vital topics, get half drunk with his friends, come home and abuse his wife, and while she is yet in tears impregnate her. In time she brings forth a child that is weak, perhaps half-witted and vicious. How can it be otherwise under such circumstances? More than nine-tenths of all the children born are conceived by accident.—Dr. D. D. Rose, "Medical World."

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

"'Mrs. Hunter?' I said, bowing—but her stiff head never inclined. In a haughty, heartless manner she spoke,

"'If you are able to read you ought to find that correct. Mrs. Owen Hunter,'—with a decided stress upon the 'Owen.' I was beginning to feel dazed. 'Mrs. Owen Hunter'! My Owen's name. Who could she be?

"'Well?' I asked.

"'Well!' she repeated. 'Does not that speak for itself? If not I will endeavor to be still more plain. I am tired of having my husband spend his nights away from home. I warn you, girl! Owen Hunter is my husband, and the father of my children. If I still find, after this, that he continues coming here, I shall find means to put an end to it, and to make it go hard with you!'

"I was as if stunned! My head swam, as I listened to this threat. My Owen the husband of this woman! Impossible! Surely, surely, there is some terrible mistake here. Not for one instant did I permit myself to believe the cruel accusation that had been hurled at me, but without deigning me another look she turned in haughty scorn to leave the room when her eye caught sight of a crayon picture—Owen's picture, my most especial pride, which had been placed upon an easel. A look like a thunder cloud passed over her face, and before I could think what her intention might be she had swooped upon it, knocked it down, and setting her foot upon it crushed the glass into a thousand pieces, cutting and hopelessly ruining the precious picture. With a cry of dismay I stepped forward, but it was too late, and with a mocking laugh she swept from the room, leaving me in a heart-broken condition.

"I had not known that Owen had a wife, and as yet I could scarcely believe it true. If such was the case I knew full well it was to her he belonged and not to me. How I managed to live through that day I do not know. My heart felt like stone in my breast; no tears came to ease or quench the aching, burning pain.

"In the evening Owen came whistling up the garden path, his handsome face all aglow with the sunshine of happiness. He came bounding into the room where I was sitting, and the next instant he had caught me in his arms and was madly straining me to his breast, smothering me with kisses. But suddenly he seemed to discover something amiss in my manner. Holding me away from him the better to look at me he said,

"'What is it, birdie? not sick are you?'

"'Yes,' I said, struggling with the tears,—'heart sick.'

"All the sunshine, all the laughter was gone from his face in an instant.

"'Explain, sweetheart, what is it?' For answer I pointed to the ruined picture.

"'Why——' he stammered. 'What has happened?'

"To speak would have been impossible. I felt as if a cold, unseen hand was clutching at my throat. So I merely handed him the card with the name of 'Mrs. Owen Hunter' upon it. I shall never forget the look of dismay that passed over his face.

"'Do you mean to say she has been here?' he articulated. I merely inclined my head. His arms fell slowly away from me and stepping to the open window, he stood looking out into nothing for a long time,—so long, indeed, that I thought he had forgotten that I was there. When he turned back to me his face looked in the gray twilight as if it had aged ten years.

"'And will my sweet love send me away because of this woman?' He asked the question holding my hand in both of his, closely pressed to his cheek. His voice did not sound the same. All the laughter, all the life had left it. I saw he was suffering, and the knowledge did not tend to lessen the pain that was tugging at my own heart. I answered his question with another,

"'She is your wife?'

"'She is. But what of that?'—doggedly.

"'Only that you belong to her, and not to me.' Then he caught me in his arms and held me so fast he almost crushed me.

"'No! no!' he huskily said, 'it is false. I do not belong to her. It is you that holds me, body and soul. That woman never married me,—only my money!'

"'But your children?'

"'What children?'

"'Why, yours—and hers.'

"'There are none!'

"My head swam; she had said, 'The father of my children,' and he said, 'There are none.' I looked into the clear blue eyes and believed him. But in spite of that I knew my dream of bliss was ended. In his madness he made the proposition that we should leave together,—go to some distant city, to Europe, anywhere where we could remain together. The world was wide and in some small corner we would find room where we might be happy.

"But to this proposition I would not listen. My mind was already made up. I would leave—leave without saying a word about it. I could not bear the thought of being the cause, perhaps, of his ruin. If I told him I knew he would never consent; but this one last night he was mine, and with that shadow threatening to engulf us we loved with the intensity of despair. But before the night had waned, clasped closely in his arms he told me the story which had wrecked his life."

With a weary movement Cora leaned her head against the bolstered back of her chair. Imelda saw that her sister was exhausted. Reproaching herself for having permitted her patient to do so much talking she gave the order, "Not one more word!" and helping her to disrobe she gently assisted her back to her couch. With a new tenderness she arranged the pillows and then insisted upon perfect quiet.

"Tomorrow will be another day, and time enough to proceed."

Cora did not protest, and soon the weary eyes were closed in slumber. Long did Imelda watch the sleeping girl while she was conscious of a new feeling toward this erstwhile wayward sister. Her heart went out to her as it had never done before, and henceforward she knew she would not be quite alone in the world as she had been. She felt that she had now found her sister, in more senses than one.

Just here it might not be out of place to make mention of that other pair of sisters to whom these two were at the present time under such heavy obligations. It had seemed rather queer to Imelda that the two should be all alone in this large house, as she had understood from what Wilbur had told her that the sisters lived in the home of their father who with the second wife had quite a family of children, but of whom there was not a trace to be seen. Only a day or two ago, however, Edith had explained to Imelda how matters stood.

VARIOUS VOICES.

T. J. McFeron, Cheney, Wash.:—I see by tag on wrapper that my time expires with the next number, so I hasten to renew as I do not want to miss a single number. I admire Brother E. C. Walker very much for the manner in which he stands for justice in the Putnam-Collins misfortune. Am very much in love with "Hilda's Home;" would be pleased to have it in book form. Also send me the following reading matter.

C. C. Ladd, Hartline, Wash.:—I want a couple of copies of "Motherhood in Freedom" to loan to some of my friends.

If the prospect is favorable for the publication of "Hilda's Home" in book form I wish you would let me know, as I think I can sell a number of copies if the work is out before harvest.

[We much regret to say that the prospect of putting "Hilda's Home" into a book is not by any means as good as we should like it to be. Too much "prosperity," of the McKinley variety. We have all we can carry now without the added expense of stereotyping the matter from the weekly forms of Lucifer. Those who care for a file of Lucifer containing the story up to this date, can still be supplied. In our present form Lucifer is easily preserved in file, or cheap cover, for future reading. M. H.]

G. W. Hoyle, Purdy, Ark.:—Please send those copies of your paper that contain an account of the "Putnam-Collins tragedy." Also a catalogue of your books on "Free loveism," or tell where I can get the same. I read your article in the "Free Thought Magazine." It was splendid, I think. Come again with another, telling us what your theory is in regard to society without marriage. Wishing you every success in all worthy undertakings.

[To inquirers like the above I would say that the first thing to do is to establish freedom to think, and freedom to act out one's thought so long and so far as the thought and its practicalization do not invade the equal right of others. This first step towards a reconstructed society would prepare the way for the next. What that next step might be could better be told after the first is taken. To all who wish to know what Lucifer teaches as the higher ideal,—or the "society without marriage," I would say, read Lucifer and "Our New Humanity," and the literature advertised by them. M. H.]

Flora W. Fox, Rochester, Minn.:—Another amazing innovation upon our present style of literature is just fresh from the publishers. Prof. Wm. Windsor, L. L. B., Ph. D., is author, as well as an eminent phrenologist and lecturer. A part of the inscription reads: "Loma,—the child of my brain, consecrated to the emancipation of woman from the enthrallment of Sex Slavery." I wish the whole race could read and have brain capacity to appreciate what Loma says. I will make a few excerpts:

Passing over Loma's very unceremonious advent from Venus into Lake Michigan and Chicago, I will note what he says of progress in Venus. "We do not favor wearing clothing, as it is unhealthy. Poisons are re-absorbed into the body. We regard marriage as a barbarous custom of savage nations. Neither sex is under a pledge to love one person to the exclusion of all others, because such a pledge is destructive of morals and is suicide of the love faculties. It is not only the right but the duty of every sane man and woman to cultivate and express love for as many individuals as possible. This does not mean promiscuous love nor promiscuous sex relations, but it does mean the largest possible freedom in social intercourse."

There is perfect equality of the sexes, and the social standing of a citizen is graded according to the fraternal and loving relations he has established. Parents are given one thousand credit marks for every perfect child gestated and born, but a less number where imperfect offspring result. Every mother is honored and surrounded with everything conducive to perfection, and has her home in the Maternity Palace. The state educates all children till twenty years of age, when they select some calling which they follow for ten years more, after which they are free. No citizen is expected to select a marital companion or consort, till thirty years old, and as procreation is under perfect control (there's no need for any "society for the suppression of vice," evidently), there are no unwelcome children.

Each child is educated in the sixty-four different faculties of the brain, giving self-control, justice and a keen sense of "mathematical equity."

Henry Addis in "Firebrand" Portland, Ore.:—It is too bad that comrade Harman should be so extremely sensative, and unable to see justice anywhere but in his own writings. (1.) The mention of "The Firebrand" was so intimately connected with mention of Loveridge—an adjoining paragraph in the same article—that I could come to no other conclusion than I did. There was no mention of any other paper, and as Loveridge's name was mentioned in connection with "The Firebrand," (2) and "his favorite journal" accused of unfairness how could I think differently from what I did? "The Firebrand" has ever and always shown Lucifer and its editor every possible favor, but its freedom has allowed just two uncomplementary remarks concerning Lucifer, sent in by correspondents, to appear in its columns. (3) If that is just cause for a threat of boycott such as appears in the above, then "free press" is a meaningles expression. (4)

[I have made several fruitless attempts to make myself understood by the editor of the "Firebrand," and if I fail this time will have to give it up.

(1.) Because I protested against his method of criticising me, without quoting what I really did say, he now thinks me extremely "sensative," and that I cannot "see justice anywhere but in my own writings."

(2.) There was mention of another journal, by Mr. Loveridge, in the "Firebrand," but I will admit that my language was liable to misconstruction. This correction was made more than once, and should have been acknowledged by Mr. Addis.

(3.) The criticism of which I complained chiefly was an editorial criticism—and the evasion of this fact, and the neglect or refusal to notice that point of my protest, is the most provoking part of the treatment accorded to us by the "Firebrand." Friend Addis cannot be so ignorant as not to know that when a paper adopts into its editorial "notes" an anonymous criticism that criticism becomes editorial,—it becomes the voice of the paper itself. If I had, in effect, praised myself as having written and "printed the only words worthy of a Freethinker," and if I had said, or adopted the statement, that the "Firebrand" had been "neutral" on a question of much interest to the defenders of Freedom, I should expect Friend Addis to protest, and if he should rap me sharply for so doing I should consider the rap well deserved. I have treated him as I should wish to be treated in turn.

(4.) I have made no threat of "boycott." I want to cooperate with everyone, even with the bigoted Christian, as far as he will let me, and the same with Freethought journals who do not treat us fairly. It is not because "The Firebrand" prints "uncomplementary" remarks about us,—of which it printed many more than the "two"—but because my own protests against misrepresentation by the editor himself were not fairly treated, and my reply criticised without giving me the benefit of my own words.

Again I say that personal controversy is not to my liking. Both the "Firebrand" and Lucifer have better work to do than throwing "brands" at each other. "The Firebrand" has its peculiarities. It prints its columns with a ragged edge, and has its own way of spelling English,—as in the paragraph quoted. It has undoubted right to its peculiarities, and I accept the assurance that its editor wishes to "show us every possible favor," and therefore I again extend the hand of friendship and good will across the continent towards our radical young cotemporary, and its band of earnest workers.

Supposing that Friend Addis has no time to read his Freethought exchanges, and hence has not read what we have said concerning the death of Samuel P. Putnam and May L. Collins we will send copies of Lucifer to him or to anyone, showing our position in regard to that very sad affair.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. I., NO. 16. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, APRIL 21, E. M. 297. [C. E. 1897.] WHOLE

The Ghost of John Gear.

In his coffin bed John Gear lay dead,
But John Gear's ghost stood near;
And the clergyman talked at the funeral
And the ghost bent low to hear:
The waiting ghost of the man who was dead,
He lingered to hear what the clergyman said;
So the clergyman spake and the people wept,
And the ghost looked on and the dead man slept—
And the dead man slept.

"The man who is dead," the clergyman said,
"Was the true salt of the earth;
Who shall gauge the good of his well-spent life
And the measure of his worth?
For he was a man of the olden type,
Of the honest, noble, sterling stripe,"
Shame fell on the ghost as he stood nigh,
For he alone knew these words were a lie—
These words were a lie.

And the ghost was afraid and was sore dismayed
As he heard the words of praise;
And he thought of the wreck and the wrong he had done
Through the stretch of the long-gone days;
And a woman's face that was blanched with tears
Loomed up from the vast of the clamoring years;
But the ghost, while he heard all the praise of the priest,
Felt burn on his forehead the mark of the Beast—
The mark of the Beast.

And the priest preached on, but the ghost of John Heard naught but the woman's tears;
For the silent tears of her silent life
Were thunder in his ears.
And the priest still preached with his words of praise,
And the face loomed up from the long-gone days;
The priest still praised and the people wept,
And the ghost passed on and the dead man slept—
—And the dead man slept.

Love—Its Attractions and Expression.

BY E. C. WALKER.

It was a dream of old that somewhere there was a fountain of Perpetual Youth. If one drank of its waters, the sun of Life would never go down in the ocean of Death. But neither man nor woman has yet seen its crystalline drops flashing in the light of day. The dream has passed with the advent of science. There is an Elixir, however, which warms the blood of age with the glowing aspirations and the tender joys of youth, which sets the flush of the rose in the pallid cheek stained with the tears of loss, lights the torch of hope in the eyes below the crown where the silver threads struggle for the victory which is sure over the strands of gold or the bands of midnight, and makes us forget even at the gates of the tomb that the sands of Life are running low.

This Elixir is Love, love free from the trammels of church and of state and of foolish and cruel custom. To him or to her who has trampled under foot the slimy poison-fanged snakes of superstition which coil and writhe and hiss and sting, even unto death, in the bowers of conventional love, the world takes on a new beauty and a new glory. The skies that arch down to the horizon's rim are a clearer, darker blue, and out of their depths at night the stars shine with a warmer brilliance. The waters of old ocean rolling wave after wave over the sands of the beach or thundering against the rocky headland, keep time, as they never kept time before, with the throbbing pulses of the blood, speaking now of power and conquest and the wild riot of transfiguring passion, and anon of rest and peace and the gentle calm that infolds hearts that are free and that for the moment know no want. A keener delight is found when the aisles of the forest are followed, or footsteps are traced by the river's marge, or when we lie on the sloping hillside, with interlocked fingers between head and sward, while our drowsy eyes lazily note the leap of the squirrel from bough to bough of the oak or chestnut or hickory that towers above us and through whose scarcely-moving leaves we catch glimpses of the cirrus clouds drifting slowly across the azure, and to our entranced ears is borne the love-lilt of finch or bluebird or starling. The rose is more resplendent, the lily is fairer, and sweeter the odor of violet and pink. Music touches us with a new pathos or a more vibrant thrill, as the stroke on key or string initiates or our mood receives. Through the glass of untrammelled love the mountains stand off in statelier grandeur, and where the long grasses bow to the zephyrs the billows of the prairie roll from foot-hill to sky-line in more glorious beauty. Love in freedom inspires to most strenuous endeavor; it electrifies the pen of the poet, the brush of the painter, the chisel of the sculptor, and it transforms into gladly-proffered service toil that is lowly and grimy and wearying.

On the free woman and the free man Cupid and Venus attend from dewy youth to the hour when the golden bowl is broken and the silver cord is loosed. Romance holds ever the hand of life, and courtship smiles alike through lips where the first down rests lightly, where the dark insignia of manhood sweeps, and where are piled the snowy drifts of age. Love, always the same, yet always different in changing robe and wreath, at once fires and subdues, exalts and sustains. The new attraction is the antidote of the deathly poison of monotony, and the exertion necessary to win countervails the tendency to enslave. Our poet, J. William Lloyd, has well expressed this pregnant truth in these lines:

Love came to me with a new-appearing head—
"I see you do not know me," Love said,
"But I have many forms, and in no one am I altogether wed."
"But I have many forms, and in no one am I altogether wed."
"But I have many forms, and in no one am I altogether wed."
"You are truly very strange, Love," said I,
"You are truly very strange, Love," said I,
"You are truly very strange, Love," said I,
"You are never twice alike, and I cannot tell the why.
"You are never twice alike, and I cannot tell the why.
"You are never twice alike, and I cannot tell the why.
Tell me, sweet Love, are you thus always unlike and appareled differently?"
Tell me, sweet Love, are you thus always unlike and appareled differently?"
Tell me, sweet Love, are you thus always unlike and appareled differently?"
"Always," said Love, "lest men weary of me.
"Always," said Love, "lest men weary of me.
"Always," said Love, "lest men weary of me.
Lest with limits of 'I know,' they should hold me less than free."
Lest with limits of 'I know,' they should hold me less than free."
Lest with limits of 'I know,' they should hold me less than free."

This brings me, very late, to the consideration of Mr. Lloyd's excellent article in No. 649 of Lucifer. The essay has attracted wide attention among our radical friends, and has drawn from them many expressions of hearty admiration and sympathy. Its two most salient points are these: 1. There will usually be a central love with a number of side loves of less intensity, and perhaps of less permanence. 2. A long courtship should precede and prepare for the complete expression of love.

It is not my intention to enter the lists in opposition to either of the propositions, but I wish to call Mr. Lloyd's attention and the attention of the readers of Lucifer to a few partly or wholly indefensible expressions, while attempting to throw some side-lights on the two main issues. I think Mr. Lloyd has tried here, as he did in the "Red Heart in a White World," to map out a good deal of territory that neither he nor any other one person has explored or ever can explore. It is unquestionably true that many natures have the craving for a central love which he depicts, but it is equally true that other natures do not have that craving. This he had admitted, but with an odious implication of shallowness, as regards the second class, which might justly call out the retort that it may be as much narrowness as depth that leads to the admitted craving of the first class. Sometimes it is true and sometimes it is not true that the man or woman to whom one turns most often and in greatest trust for sympathy and help is also the woman or man to whom one is most passionately attached. So it might easily be that there would be two central loves, one a comradeship-love and the other a passion-love, to make use of some rather awkward combinations.

When Mr. Lloyd writes of "some soul-mate and heart-comrade whose faith and loyalty are as certain as life and the procession of the seasons," he speaks the language of the poet. Men and women are fallible and we can never be certain that change and even treachery will not at some time carry from us the best of friends and the dearest of lovers.

We are diverse in our attractions and our needs, and we contradict ourselves at different periods in our lives. There are monogamists and varietists; there are varietists who love one more than any other and there are varietists who find it difficult to tell which one, if any, they love most, while some are monogamists at one time and varietists at another, sometimes having a central love, and sometimes two or more loves of approximately equal intensity. And so on in the practically unending chapter of variations. No "ideal" that can be dreamed out or thought out will do for a majority of the human family.

I very seriously question if we can "love all those who love whom we love." Love is a matter of attraction, and friendship implies congeniality. We can mind our own business, respect the equal liberty of all, and so dwell in concord, but love or even friendship, demands something more positive than toleration, more intimate than peaceful neighborhood.

I do not think that free love "has usually taken either the monogamic or the promiscuous extreme." What I except to in this is the word "promiscuous." Even if it had always been taught that "permanent love was a delusion, and a succession of episodes all that a wise lover could expect," that would not imply adhesion to the doctrine or practice of promiscuity, but rather the opposite. Promiscuous signifies without selection, and therefore there could be nothing more inappropriate and illogical than the classification of variety as promiscuity. A man or a woman associating with one of the other sex and with that one only, after mutual love has ceased to draw them together, is promiscuous in his or her sexual relations, because he or she has ceased to be selective, while, on the other hand, the person who changes lovers once in three months because in each instance no longer attracted to the old love is anything but promiscuous in his or her intimacies—in fact, he or she is selective in a very high degree. Let us not lose sight of the plain meaning of words.

It is much to be doubted if Mr. Lloyd can substantiate his assertion that free love has hitherto "slighted and ignored courtship." Under freedom, the length of courtship will vary with the temperaments of the participants, and it is not necessary to formulate any general "ideal." Each case will be settled as it comes into court, so to speak, regardless of any other person's preconceptions. And I wish to say with all possible emphasis that the courtship will be co-terminous with the period of spontaneous love relations, no matter what the degree of intimacy at any time and no matter when full intimacy begins. The divorce of courtship and sex association should be utterly alien to the thought of the social radical. That is to say, the idea that courtship must cease when intimate association commences is a relic of the barbarism of marriage, and the sooner we get rid of it the better for us and for the race.

Today the battle rages around the standard of Liberty. What may come after liberty is secured we do not know; reasoning by analogy, we hold that liberty in love is good; we have tasted a little of its fruits, and we have found them sweet and wholesome. But we of this age, in the front of the fight, realize that the sword of the emancipator is better fitted to the hand than the trowel of the temple-builder. I think the chief benefit of the plans drawn today in Philistia is the manual and mental exercise the draughtsmen obtain as they work. Real society grows; it is not made. It is easily conceivable that our Utopias would be the hells of our descendants, the children of a larger heredity and subject to environments to which we are strangers.

Love and Freedom. II.

BY FORD.

Many people acknowledge love as a force in human affairs. All people, with few exceptions perhaps, experience love in some degree during their lives, but some say nothing about it afterward. Some even say it is all a delusion and a snare—that open-eyed common sense does not admit of any such nonsense as that sentimental thing called love. Why is this thus? Perhaps the answer is not so hard as we imagine. At least a deal of new light may be shed upon the subject by a little thinking.

It is impossible here to go into those fine distinctions of attraction, from that shown by the savage to that of the kind and gentle intelligent person in our highly "civilized" country. What I mean by love just now is the attraction, the guiding force between those who are supposed to understand something of life between the sexes when these are drawn to each other. To me it has come more and more to mean a working of a better, more perfect life. The elements of this better life being more fully aroused by contact of the sexes, it is by the love expressions of such contact that both its reward and its means of growth are found. But people who have little knowledge of what love really is and little leisure for finding out, or little inclination to study the question except to follow their unreasoning or at least perverted instincts, will "fall in love" and then—why, very properly "fall out" again in most cases.

A proper understanding of love involves an overturning of much old fogyism. It will put a stop to the idea of loving only one person; more properly, to the idea of marriage. If we can rightly love whom we please or must; can express that love by moral right, then "marriage" is useless. Love has a greater binding force than any man-made law. Love, like knowledge, grows from within, and like it, gives off with no diminution of power, but rather grows from the exercise. The elements necessary to love created or generated by the sex organs are capable of great things as they become understood, in developing human character. But such understanding can only come with that broadening of life due to general enlightenment and leisure of all the people.

We love that which gives us pleasure. Sex life being the highest, the elements set in motion by contact in mutual attraction of the sexes is the highest expression of love. To be such it must be free, voluntary,—no marriage, no bond but love. In that case the persons might be attracted and meet once or many times, to only talk, to clasp hands, to kiss, or to go to the extreme expression, all depending on their state of development toward a true, normal life.

Investigation of what love is shows it is but life, I think,—a higher life that brings new elements to our use, and only a glance will show it is foolish, blind, to place all our hopes of life upon one person when many others are just as capable of giving and receiving love as that one—of expressing it with us.

Sex hunger may, when people know enough, be satisfied wherever suitable food be found, just as we satisfy our stomachs.

Whether we remain "faithful" to one person (though doing so seems impossible under a broader education) may depend upon the force of attraction between the pair, for no statute law can make them love unless by keeping them in ignorance of more congenial companions they have a right, morally, to find.

In our hurry-scurry world where chasing the phantom of the almighty dollar is the fashionable pastime, love, worthy the name, comes to the surface rarely except to be aroused for a moment by contact of the senses, then working its own destruction from want of knowing how to grow, it dies out and we hear that love is "all nonsense," "sentiment," that it has no place in this work-a-day world. But it will have a place in the world in the not very misty future.

Time will be when people will satisfy love hunger—sex-hunger, where they find the right food, not thinking they must have one "grand passion" any more than that they must always eat at one table—for that is exactly what "marriage" amounts to.

When all have a chance to make something of themselves and become much more lovable comparatively than now, people will be less concentrated, narrow, "selfish." So our ideas of life are narrow now. We think liberty, that is, new liberty, means immorality, because we have seen that a desire for liberty suppressed resulted in some sort of ruin. But most of us have yet to learn that liberty alone can mean a better life, while ignorance and old ideas of liberty mean stagnation. Then, free love means not to be tied to the "dead body of our idol," but to know the laws of life and drink in its sweets all along life's journey—not to be tied to one table, cook or kitchen, but to know the laws of food and digestion and to use that food which is necessary wherever we may be.

Love belongs to the person, just as any one's sense does. It is just as narrow and foolish to love only one person, as our customs and traditions require, as it is to stay in one town all a lifetime.

Free love, then, is a better life, a liberty that means growth. It means knowledge and happiness now unknown. It does not mean that I have any right to expect any woman to love me because I am attracted to her and ask her to do so. It means, when you fully comprehend it, that no person can truly love, in the highest sense that some have learned to know the word, a person who does not freely return that love, for the causes of incompatibility will be plain. This state of things cannot come at once, but it also cannot come except with greater freedom. Women must not be compelled to "marry," to sell themselves sexually for the necessities or even luxuries of life. There must be growth of intellect among the masses caused by agitation, sufficient to demand, rather to command progress. "The masses" must become the best people. The worker, not the idler or person with title, "pedigree" or property, will be of the best of the land. All progress means growth, experience, not mere book education, though the latter may cause new ideas and experiences.

So I would say many people do not believe in love—to say nothing of free love—because of not knowing what it is. Our lives are not deep enough, or broad enough.

A New Monthly Magazine.

TO THE READERS OF LUCIFER. Dear Friends: I avail myself of Friend Harman's kindness, to let you know through his paper that I intend shortly to commence the publication of a new magazine to be called "The Philosopher," the subscription price to be 50 cents a year.

My intention in its publication is not to advocate any special reform, but to encourage the philosophical spirit, and to help us to view all questions in a broad and liberal manner, seeking for whatever is good in all lines of progress, and trying to make it available for individual and collective happiness.

During the first year, I shall in each number reprint one chapter of a book I am now writing, entitled "The Nature of the Mind, or Can Individuality Persist After Death?" In this book I give the many reasons I have to believe that Mind is a substance closely connected with Magnetism, and the book is really an argument to show that the statements I have made in my book upon Vital Force have a foundation in scientific facts. I believe that the many persons who have been pleased with my book upon Vital Force, Magnetic Exchange and Magnetation, will be interested in this new work, and that it will be of great use to them in understanding all phenomena of a psychologic nature.

Any of Lucifer's readers who would like to see a copy of "The Philosopher" will have one sent to them by mailing me a postal card with their name and address. I shall be specially pleased to receive such a request from any of my old subscribers to the "Sociologist."

As I would like to have some subscribers to start with, I make the following offer. To anyone sending me twenty-five cents in postage stamps, I will send "The Philosopher" six months, and send at once," In Brighter Climes, or Life in Socioland," a novel of mine just published, where I show what life would be in a country where taxation has been abolished, the ownership of land limited, gold and silver demonetized, public utilities placed in the hands of the people, and individual freedom greatly extended. In this book I also casually discuss Marriage, Divorce, and the right standard of sexual morality. The book contains over 250 pages, and from comments from those who have already read it, will, I believe, prove interesting to those persons who seek for social progress in the lines discussed.

I will also take pleasure in sending the book free to any editor who will agree to read it, review it, and send me a marked copy of its review in their paper. Your friend,

Sociologic Lesson. No. XXXVII.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

THE LABOR NOTE. The basis of the currency, in the foregoing, has been assumed to be gold. More exactly it may be stated to be value, and value is the result of past labor. Gold is practically the basis, because gold, more exactly than anything else, represents past labor which has produced something universally desired or valued. The labor note, when issued for past labor of value, and when redeemable in definite amounts of products of other past labor of value, stands upon the same footing with government notes redeemable in gold, with this exception, that the redeemability, instead of being assured by the whole people who compose the government, rests upon the good faith and ability of a small number of men, unknown except in a small locality. If the amount is indefinite, or if those who promise to redeem the note are liable to failure from death or other causes, the notes will be of uncertain value; and the producing classes will be first to feel the loss.

When the attempt is made to base a note, not upon past but upon future labor, not only is the element of uncertainty vastly increased, and the value of the note correspondingly diminished, but slave labor is substituted for free labor as its basis. A free man has the right to change his work or to cease to work, paying due regard to the necessity for completing partly finished work. The man who agrees indefinitely to perform certain work whenever required by others, loses his liberty.

While many plans for labor notes are defective for these reasons, and perhaps the defects are without remedy in society as it is, yet it may be possible in a re-organized society to introduce a currency consisting of labor notes which will avoid these defects, as I shall hereafter try to explain.

HAVING had more than his equitable share of space in recent issues, the "scribe" of Lucifer takes a back seat this week, and gives place to correspondents. Those friends whose articles still fail no appear will please remember that of all trying positions in life, that of an editor is perhaps the most perplexing. How to equitably apportion the space at his command, and yet give offense to none, requires skill and judgment almost if not quite superhuman.

Woman's Responsibility.

There is really so little difference between the position occupied by Mrs. Waisbrooker and that contended for by myself, that there seems little or no need of rejoinder. While denying woman's "responsibility to the unborn" Mrs. Waisbrooker practically admits such responsibility when she says, "When woman wakes to her power, withdraws her thought-force from man's system . . . . our present system of wrong and outrage will disappear."

The very worst feature of "man's system,"—the feature that must be eliminated before the system as a whole can be destroyed or reformed, is the enslavement of woman in her maternal functions—her sex-life, and to deny woman's responsibility to offspring, while submitting to this enslavement is to deny her responsibility as reformer of man's economic system, or "system of force," of which Mrs. Waisbrooker speaks.

So far as I now remember, the subject of "contracepts" was not present in my thought when replying to Mrs. Waisbrooker's previous article. I certainly do not recommend contracepts as the best or the only means by which woman can secure immunity from unwelcome parenthood. I simply contend for woman's right to choose the means of securing such immunity. I have my own objections to all such expedients, but maintain that wisdom—knowledge utilized, is absolutely necessary to woman and to man alike. Woman should claim and exercise the right to use such "scientific appliances" whenever her enlightened judgment tells her it is the best thing for her to do—all conditions and results considered. There is nothing that woman (or man) can do but may be right and proper for her to do under conceivable conditions. There is no absolute standard of right or duty, in this or any other relation of life.

As to whether man can waken woman to a sense of her power is yet to be tried. If man were not himself part woman, that is, possessed of feminine elements in his make-up, it might be true that he is powerless to awaken woman to a sense of her responsibility to the unborn. I still adhere to the statement that the population question is not primarily nor solely a question of sex. While it is true that upon woman rests, and should rest, the chief responsibility of parenthood—since she performs all the real work of child-building, it is also true that man, as member of the human solidarity, is vitally interested in the result of the work of child building. Hence if woman will not rouse herself it would seem to be right and proper that man should try to rouse his "veiled and sleeping" sister.

A friend at my right suggests and formulates, as an addition to the foregoing, the following:

"Mrs. Waisbrooker's recommendation to Messrs. 'Harman, Ruedebusch and Elliott' to practice continence, is somewhat interesting in view of the fact that she will scarcely claim that such men as they make women sex slaves. If they are not 'continent,' then, it must follow that the women with whom they associate desire such association. With all due respect for Mrs. Waisbrooker's judgment I must advance it as my opinion that the women who love, and are loved by, these men should be the ones to choose what form their association with them shall take, and these free women would doubtless consider all such advice as that of Mrs. Waisbrooker's a work of supererogation."

Marriage and Freethought

BY C. L. JAMES.

It was among the profound remarks of that really great "Freethinker," Francis Bacon, that mere infidelity, being nothing, amounts to nothing. The true Material-Atheist is born, not made. He is simply a man who was built that way, nor can I see a particle of evidence that the percentage of persons thus defective in spiritual insight is either less or greater now than at any previous time. Accordingly a publication devoted to the propagation of Material-Atheism alone, can do no good except the incidental one of helping to secure freedom for expression of all honest thought. But a publication devoted to discouraging freedom for the expression of honest thought in the name of infidelity, may do a great deal of harm. On this account I have long regarded the "Free Thought Magazine" as an avowed enemy to progress—its mission being to engage as many born atheists as possible in resistance to all innovations except those their atheism makes it certain they will favor in any case. Since, however, Mr. Green has admitted into his pages a defense of Free Love, and assumed to answer the same, his reply becomes worth considering on its own merits.

Mr. Green professes to favor marriage "not because of the Adam and Eve myth story," but "because it is proved by experience to have produced the greatest amount of happiness of any institution in the world." That would not be saying much for it. No institution is, or can, in the nature of things, be anything but a method of perpetuating barbarous customs, from which, in its absence, men, as they became more enlightened, would get away the faster.

But where is the experience he refers to? Why does he not give us some details? It requires very little "experience" to teach us that marriage cannot exist without the aid of prostitution, and very little to teach that it is but a modification of prostitution. Louis IX, of France, (Saint Louis), and, at a much later period, the Empress Maria Theresa, entirely suppressed prostitution for some time. These eminent and virtuous Catholic sovereigns reluctantly repealed their edicts because "experience" showed them that in suppressing prostitution they were suppressing marriage too.

If Mr. Green does not know this he ignores the "experience" of history. If he does know it, how can he say that "experience" proves marriage beneficial, unless, indeed, he is prepared to say the same of prostitution? In another place he says that he would have "government protect and guard and improve" marriage. Unless he condescends to tell us how, we may safely retort his and Moore's most unfair charge of suppressing our real sentiments.

It is not, indeed, difficult to see how government might "protect and guard" marriage. It might give parents an absolute right to sell their daughters in marriage at any age. It might make marriage indissoluble for any cause. It might punish adultery with death. But all these things have been very extensively done; and they have been discontinued (when at all) because "experience showed" that they did not promote happiness.

As to "improving" marriage, what the big, big D does Mr. Green mean by that? Let him try to have divorce granted for marital rape; and he will soon find others know, if he does not, that "experience shows" this would be abolishing marriage!

The long and short of it is that what Green takes for experience is simply prejudice. There is no experience showing that the institution of marriage is conducive to happiness. But Green, and other people who do not think, are used to a particular form of that institution; and because they don't think they assume that what they are used to is O. K.

The first characteristic of a real freethinker, not a mere atheist, is to think; and the first result of thinking is to teach him that the institutions of his own time differ only in degree of badness, not at all in kind of badness, from the older institutions they have supplanted.

The Gospel of Self-Respect.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

In No. 654 there was a question raised which I think involves a very important principle. If I do not misunderstand Mr. Mathers, he said that he would not care to associate with people who "gratify their sensual passions" regardless of principle. These people, I infer, are the women who unthinkingly and weakly yield themselves to the "seducer"—the man who seeks only his momentary gratification regardless of the consequences to the woman,—and those women who sell themselves in prostitution outside of marriage.

This position seems to me untenable, and for this reason: I can think of no more important possession than self-respect, which should include a self worthy of respect. If a woman does something of which she is ashamed she thereby injures herself. It matters not how innocent the act may be, how free from injury to others. If she feels that it is wrong, it is wrong for her, for it lessens her sense of self-respect. For this reason, I would say to any woman who seemed to desire my opinion, "Do you think you are doing right? Do you feel that your course of action is for the highest and ultimate good of yourself, your children and humanity? If so, you are on the "Open Road" even though from my view-point you are going backward. I believe that when you discover your mistake you will retrace your steps, will repair your error as well as may be."

But this is aside from the question, do you say? I think not; for I want to impress on the mind of the reader the great importance which I attach to the sense of self-respect. To the weak woman, or to the woman who has lost her self-respect, I would say: "Such loss is not irreparable. You may yet be an 'honest' woman, a 'virtuous' woman, a self-respecting woman.

"Only resolve that you will do what you feel to be right, that you will attain that self-respect, and you cannot fail to win the respect of others, as well."

If a man is blind, do we knock him down, then kick him for falling, and when he strives to rise, mockingly laugh at his stumbling steps? Nay, if he stumble, and fall, and lie discouraged and feeling himself forsaken, do we not go to him and give him a helping hand, and set him on the right way, even taking our own time, if necessary, to accompany him as far as needful? So, when we see a girl, reared in the darkness of ignorance of her own being, the vitiating atmosphere of dependence on the will and guidance of others, thrown in her helplessness upon the world, and "falling," in her blindness into the slough of disgrace, what should we do? Shall we refuse to aid her to reach the solid ground of self-respect, fearing that, in touching her, some of the slime of her disgrace may cling to us? If we are so easily contaminated we are surely losing our foothold on the only sure foundation of self-respect and are already disgraced by such cowardice.

There is no one so low or degraded that he or she has no redeeming qualities. Let us respect that which seems respectworthy; let us show our hope for the growth of, and our kindly interest in, all those with whom we come in contact, whether we think they are guided by the clear light of our principles, or not.

I do not think there is "an orthodox saloon-keeper, gambler or prostitute" in Chicago or in the world whose proffered hand I would refuse. My own line of conduct is, to myself, very clearly defined, and I have not the slightest fear that, even in the company of the members of those professions I would either drink, play for gain, or sell my body for a night or a lifetime. I am thoroughly convinced that such action would not be for my good, so why should I blindly follow the example of others whom I think are injuring themselves?

For the improvement of ourselves, as well as for the betterment of conditions for those who come after us, we need an increase in friendly feeling for those who do not see principles as we do; we need a higher sense of justice, which will restrain us from invading the personal domain of others, even when we feel that it is for their good; and more than all, or first of all, do we need a greater development of self-knowledge, self-poise, self-respect.

Woman's Power.

BY LOIS WAISBROOKER.

I see by Lucifer of March 24, that its editor has not only found place for my article, but for comments as long as the article itself, and further, he kindly invites me to reply to comments.

"It is because I believe with Charlotte Perkins Stetson that woman 'walketh veiled and sleeping'," etc.

Well, really, I should like to look into Mrs. Stetson's face while someone took the ground that the "sleeping power" to which she refers should be applied in using contracepts to the limiting of the family.

"To awaken my sister woman from her lethargy—her criminal lethargy,—to a sense of her responsibility to the unborn."

I deny that responsibility. A slave is not a responsible party. Does not Mr. Harman know that no woman will bear a child unless man has first begotten it? It lies with him to limit the family, not with her, and when Mr. Harman, Ruedebusch, Elliot, and others who advocate contracepts, will practice continence and rouse their brothers "to a sense of their responsibility," there will be no need of scientific, and so-called harmless appliances to prevent conception. I cannot speak for other women, but were I thirty instead of seventy, and life's strong tide demanded expression I would seek self-relief before I would enter into a sex relation with a man and scientific appliances between, for then I alone would know of the degradation, and woman's arm is not "too short to reach our economic system in any other way."

It is the "sleeping power" of which but few women are yet conscious, and which man cannot waken her to, for he does not understand, it being peculiarly her own—it is this power that will do the work when roused and rightly applied. Yes, it is true that woman "can do but little without man's co-operation," nothing in the way of construction. Men and women in their work are like the warp and woof of a piece of cloth: take either out the other naturally goes to pieces. When woman wakes to her power, withdraws her thought-force from man's system and gestates the warp for a new order of things, she will then become the positive power, and not only the economic, but all other parts of our present system of wrong and outrage will disappear. Woman in doing this need not, will not, 'antagonize" man, but the system; she will simply change the polarity of his action, of his methods, and this she cannot do if she consent to unnatural sex-relations to please him. The sex-fountain is the source of power and consenting to tamper with it to please man diverts that power to man's use; and as a sex, he will continue to use such power to perpetuate this system of force, till obliged to relinquish his hold by just such withdrawal of thought support as I am trying to show.

And now, as I have just read "The New Ideal," I will pay my respects to its author. Mr. Ruedebusch says of my pamphlet, "Anything More, My Lord," "that all the arguments made therein refer only to enslaved, superstitious women and hence do not apply to our case."

I hardly know how to characterize this assertion. If a belief in—a knowledge of a future life, and that sex, its right use gives us the best condition for the enjoyment of that life, is superstition, then my words are for the superstitious, the enslaved woman, but I deny that such knowledge based on intelligent investigation is superstition. If so, then I am superstitious, and yet I believe myself even a better Freethinker than Mr. Ruedebusch himself, for instead of rejecting my own experiences and those of millions of others, I am free to search for the cause of so much harm to the human family from this source, and I find it rooted in the personal-god-idea and that of the belief in the right of that life, or of those there, to rule the affairs of this. I reject everything of the kind. I claim the right to think and act for myself independently of the arbitrary control of any personality or set of personalities in the universe.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXV.

From this explanation it was evident that neither of the two elder daughters had any too much love for the stepmother, who was domineering in character. Of late years the freedom-loving Edith had refused to submit to her many dictations. She absolutely refused in any manner to be a subordinate. When Hilda found her sister making such a brave effort to free herself from the domination of the stepmother she was not long in following her example. The stepmother appealed to the father, who in turn ordered his daughters to explain.

Edith did explain. She said that Hilda and herself were now old enough to judge for themselves in all personal matters. They demanded freedom in all their actions. If it were refused them at home they would seek a home elsewhere. With youth and health they were confident they would not starve.

But Edmund Wallace was a proud man. After the disastrous ending of his first marriage, with the second wife, brilliant and fashionable, at his side,—a woman who seemed better to understand how to manage her husband than did the timid Erna before her, Mr. Wallace had been more successful financially. Dabbling in politics he had secured to himself political and social position and hence the idea that his daughters should leave his house to find a home elsewhere was not at all to his liking. Such a thing would draw attention, and cause unpleasant notoriety. So, for once, he sided with his daughters and gave his wife to understand that they were at liberty in all personal matters to do as they pleased.

The haughty woman was almost strangled in her anger, but found herself forced to submit. But if she could no longer domineer there were a thousand other ways in which she could make the lives of the girls a daily torture. The result was that Edith again turned to her father, telling him that under existing circumstances they could not and would not longer remain. So another and more decided change was made. A room was assigned to Edith and Hilda as their "sanctum." Through the political influence of the father positions were secured for both girls, which furnished them with pocket money to spend as they saw fit. The salary of each was sixty dollars per month, twenty of which each contributed toward keeping up the establishment. This arrangement made them independent, and from the day it was made both refused to take part in the household duties. Mrs. Wallace had to procure hired help. Then it was she came to realize the full value of these despised step-daughters. But as she considered it beneath her dignity to unbend towards the girls there was a constant frigidity between them.

There were four children from this second marriage, two girls and two boys; the girls being the eldest. All four were away at school. Mr. and Mrs. Wallace were away spending the hot summer months at some mountain resort. The girls having vacation, nothing averse, took charge of the house, expecting later in the season to spend a week or two on some quiet country farm. To the circumstance of the absence of the rest of the family was it due that Cora had found such a haven of rest under this roof prepared by the kind and loving hearts and hands of this sister pair. That she herself was the sister of one who had such a warm friend in that absent brother who to them personated the whole of all manly graces and perfections, made it to seem more like a privilege than otherwise that they should have been permitted to lavish their tenderest care upon her; besides the sufferer had won for herself a place in these sisterly hearts that was all her own, a place that no one would ever be able to deprive her of.

Alice had often called during the past two weeks but as yet had not seen the injured girl. Somehow Cora had always been asleep and it was deemed unwise to awaken her. Norman also had found his way several times to the Wallace abode, as indeed it would have been strange if he had not. When making his first visit he said:

"It seems we are destined to love under difficulties—always someone claiming the love and attention of the woman that I fain would monopolize." When he heard that in this case the claim came from the lost and erring sister a cloud had for a moment rested upon his manly face. Then gravely and tenderly he had said, kissing the pure forehead of the girl he loved,

"Do what you think is your duty, and what you think is best, my sweetheart. I would not have you do otherwise,"—and then Imelda had gone back to her sister's bedside with a much lighter heart and with a new sense of happiness. Today, as she stood watching the face of the sleeping sister, thoughts and feelings came crowding upon her that she herself might have found difficult to analyze. Poor Cora, thought Imelda, how manifold and oft how painful had been her experiences. If she had dealt many a cruel blow to others, in the thoughtlessness of youth, it was very evident that she had suffered much and keenly, and yet—looking at her experiences without prejudice, was she not, in some respects, more to be envied than to be pitied or condemned? This very reckless daring that was Cora's chief characteristic, had secured to her a term of such intense, such exquisite happiness that Imelda, with her high-strung morals, could never hope to attain, and as she bent to kiss the sleeping girl she whispered:

"You possess more courage than the sister you think so pure. You are more true to nature and to yourself than I."

When Cora awoke, refreshed from a long sleep, she would have resumed the thread of her story but Imelda positively refused to listen. Instead the invalid was again arrayed in the pretty wrapper and, with the assistance of Hilda, was led down the broad stairway to the handsome parlor. Here the trio of girls read, played and sang for her amusement, and several times during the evening Cora's clear, sweet laugh rang out, making music in Imelda's heart. An unbroken night's rest followed, and the next morning found the sisters once more seated by the window and Cora ready to take up the thread of her narrative where she had left off the day before.

"Owen Hunter was the only child of very wealthy parents. They were the possessors of millions. All the advantages that wealth can procure had been his. At college he had graduated with the first honors. He was gifted with talents of high order—a poet born; a musical genius, and his gift of song alone would have made him famous, had he so desired. But, as is so often the case with natures of this kind, he was very impulsive. The blood in his veins was extra hot, and at the early age of eighteen he had got himself entangled with a dark-eyed southern beauty, whom he deemed the perfection of all womankind. His mother had died when he was sixteen, else she might perhaps have been able to guide him with loving gentleness where reason and parental commands failed. The girl with whom he had fallen so madly in love was also wealthy, and had had the benefit of a thorough education—that is, a fashionable one. She knew how to dance, how to bow gracefully. She possessed an exhaustless supply of small talk, quick of repartee, brilliant and witty. She knew how to haughtily snub a social inferior—and so on through the long list of fashionable accomplishments.

"Owen saw only the fascinating smile and the wild, witching beauty that had set fire to his brain. For some reason his father was opposed to an alliance with Leonie Street. Perhaps he better read beneath the attractive surface. But Owen was determined, and when he was scarcely twenty he married the girl who had so completely bewildered his senses. Young as he was he was at the head of a large business firm. His father of late had been in poor health, and upon the young man's shoulders was laid the burden that had become too heavy for those of the older man. And when his father died, stepping into his inheritance he found himself worth some twenty millions of dollars.

"Long ere this, however, Owen Hunter had discovered that he had made a grand matrimonial mistake. The woman he had married was only a fashion plate, with this difference. A fashion plate is called inanimate, whereas Mrs. Hunter was possessed of a temper so fiery that she became quite dangerous when something occurred to arouse her ire. In her passionate moods she was so vulgar as to be disgusting. One babe had come, but as if her passion was a poison that killed, the little thing only lived a few days, and none other ever came.

"Of short duration had been their honeymoon. She managed soon to thoroughly disenchant her boy husband—to cure him of the infatuation that had led him to brave even his father's displeasure; displeasure which might have meant a great deal to him, as his father was noted for a certain bull-dog tenacity or stubbornness. When once he took a stand, either for or against, he would hold to it, to the bitter end, no matter if later he found that only he was in the wrong and all others in the right.

"Since there was no sweet baby smile to woo and win the hearts of these two, Owen and Leonie Hunter daily drifted farther and farther apart, neither caring, or little caring, what the other was doing. His millions were at her command where with to satisfy her every whim, and this wealth enabled her to worship at the shrine of fashion, to her heart's content. Their "home" was a mansion; one of the most beautiful of homes, but Owen Hunter only went to it to sleep, and not always then. Sometimes home did not see him for weeks at a time. The clubs suited him better than the princely mansion which contained his dark-browed wife. His wedded experience had made him reckless, and he made the most of what his wealth would buy him. He was not by nature bad; not by any means. He was only what circumstances had made him. Deep down hidden in the innermost recesses of his being were the germs of a noble manhood, but those germs were fast going to decay for want of the magic touch which would waken them to life and growth. Sometimes he felt heartsick and soul-weary when he realized that with all the countless wealth at his command there was none so poor as he; that his bosom bore a starving heart. In all the vast multitudes of the great city there was not one face to brighten at his coming, to smile a welcome at his return to the place he called home.

"In a mood like this, one evening as he was passing a deserted thoroughfare he was attracted by a woman's cry. A woman was struggling in the grasp of a man. A well directed blow felled the ruffian to the earth while the rescuer caught an almost fainting girl in his arms.

"That was the way in which I became acquainted with Owen Hunter. He offered to see me to my home. I told him I had none. He seemed to understand it all in a moment, and afterwards he told me that he did so understand. A young woman whose condition was so apparent, and no home, could have only one story to tell,—a very common story, and at that moment he felt, as he afterwards explained, just as forlorn and alone, just as hopeless and homeless. It was as though I had touched a hidden wellspring. He drew my arm through his and said:

"'Come.'

"I was trembling in every nerve. The terror I had undergone almost paralyzed me. He saw I was almost unable to stand."

VARIOUS VOICES.

Elizabeth H. Russell, Cleveland, O.:—It seems I forgot to say that the hand mill works all right, and gives perfect satisfaction.

[In answer to frequent inquiries we say that no word of dissatisfaction has yet reached us from those who have bought hand mills of us. M. H.]

Victor Laine, Santa Cruz, Cal.:—I hasten to inclose one dollar for a years' subscription to Lucifer. I read the "Snap Shots at Frauds and Fossils," by Walker, and it is just, right and very good. I have also read your article in the "Free Thought Magazine." Will say it is grand, very fine. I hope to get more like that in Lucifer. Please send me a copy of Lucifer of Jan. 13, 1897, if you can.

F. A. M. Cook, M. D., Columbus, Kan.:—Have had mail in three weeks installments this winter. Am behind with all my papers but will send you a dollar. The hand mill has been my one support, and does good work.

[Lucifer has gone regularly to Dr. Cook, so far as we know. Many complaints of failure of the mails reach us. All we can say is, be sure to let us know when papers fail to come and we will try again. M. H.]

C. E. Baird, Philadelphia, Penn.:—I have just received from some source February 10th number of Lucifer, and read it. I see in it ideas I have long entertained but have not met many people in my life who agree with me. I am glad to see your paper and inclose my check for same for three months and the above publications. I will very probably order all your books soon. I subscribe for all publications of merit that have for their object the freeing of our people from social, political and religious bondage.

Sylvina L. Woodard, Golden Eagle, Ill.:—Inclosed find one dollar subscription to Lucifer for another year. Times are very hard here, as I suppose they are everywhere among those who "earn their bread by the sweat of their brows," but I must stand by our old friend Lucifer as long as I can. It seems to me that the political tangle of our government grows more complicated every year. Oh, for a few more honest men who will not be bribed, but will work for the best good of the down-trodden, toiling masses.

F. C. Keinath, Lacon, Ill.:—I am a reader of "Truth Seeker" and "Free Thought Magazine." S. P. Putnam has been my ideal Freethinker and when I saw H. L. Green's editorial in January magazine, I was grieved to think that a Liberal would write such an article about the deceased President of the Free-thought Federation. In his editorial he mentioned Moses and Lillian Harman, also Lucifer. I sent for some copies of Lucifer, liked them and subscribed for three months. I am very much pleased with Lucifer and intend to stay with it. I have never seen "Our New Humanity." Inclosed find twenty-five cents for which you may send me the January number.

Dora Boss, Amherst, Wis.:—Yours received. Sorry you needed to notify me, but it was all because I was in receipt of so much "McKinley prosperity." The voters are all Republicans up in this neck o' woods and the confidence game worked finely. Home industries are developing. An epidemic of small burglaries—all "prentice jobs" and evidently by home talent. Plenty of arrests, foreclosures of mortgages, etc., etc.

Likewise the time-honored vocation of tramping seems to have received a new impetus here. Co-operative industry also flourishes by means of which an unusual number of babies barsinistered and otherwise are cared for by the town collectively. And yours truly is poor as a church mouse, but nevertheless incloses you one dollar on subscription.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. I., NO. 17. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, APRIL 28, E. M. 297. [C. E. 1897.] WHOLE NO. 656.

In the Fair Future.

"Fair the crown the Cause hath for you, well to die or well to live,
Through the battle, through the tangle, peace to gain or peace to give."
Ah, it may be! Oft meseemeth, in the days that yet shall be,
When no slave of gold abideth 'twixt the breadth of sea to sea,
Oft, when men and maids are merry, ere the sunlight leaves the earth,
And they bless the day beloved, all too short for all their mirth,
Some shall pause awhile and ponder on the bitter days of old,
Ere the toil of strife and battle overthrew the curse of gold;
Then 'twixt lips of loved and lover solemn thoughts of us shall rise;
We who once were fools and dreamers, then shall be the brave and wise.

Another Defeat for the Ambitious Mr. Comstock.

BY E. C. WALKER.

The agent of vice has been very active of late; he has arrested several book dealers, and seized many books, including classical works of genius and enduring fame. As is usual, he has displayed the most dense ignorance of literature and the most callous disregard of the commonest rights of the man and of the citizen. He confiscates property without warrant of law, dominates courts and juries, browbeats witnesses, terrorizes publishers, and intimidates or bamboozles a large section of the press. Even the papers that do protest do so in such a faint-hearted manner, accompanying their censures with so many ifs, ands, buts, and praiseful reservations that their mild condemnation loses nearly all its force before it reaches its abject object. Comstock will go on in his career of spoliation while the "molders of public opinion" bow to the morality fetich; he will continue to rob and imprison until our people get intelligence enough to perceive that sex is not in itself impure, that social diseases are not to be cured by putting over them a plaster of virtuous pretense, and that continued suppression of knowledge aggravates the evils caused by inherited ignorance and economic injustice.

After a long series of successes, however, Comstock has suffered one defeat. Gabriele D'Annunzio is a young Italian poet and novelist of great but pessimistic genius. He has written many books and in the highest style of art. Among these is "The Triumph of Death." Translated from the Italian into the French and from the French into English (the last translation by Prof. Arthur Hornblow), the work was brought out in the United States by George H. Richmond & Co., for many years established in the publishing business in New York. "The Triumph of Death" had been twice mutilated by the self-constituted emasculators of literature, but still it shocked the sensitive morals of Mr. Anthony Comstock, of Green street notoriety. George H. Richmond and his son were arrested, and several hundred copies of the book were seized and carted away by the Vice Society's freebooters. The Richmonds fought determinedly for their property, reputation, and liberty. The cause was heard in the Court of Special Sessions, Justices Hinsdale, Jacob and Jerome on the bench. The defense sought to introduce witnesses to show how the incriminated book was regarded by men familiar with letters. The prosecution objected and the court sustained the objection. The judges affirmed that it was a question of fact, with which they were wholly competent to deal. In passing it should be said that it is a tradition, now almost lost sight of in this country, that the jury is judge both of the fact and of the law, while, as an apparent compromise, American jurisprudence maintains that the jury can consider the facts only, the court being the sole interpreter of the law. In this instance, the court declares itself judge of both law and fact. How swiftly we are reeling on toward the abyss of absolute judicial despotism, this comparison of the past and present reveals.

The judges of the Court of Special Sessions may be experts in law but are they experts in literature and morals? What special training have they had that would qualify them for such work? How comes it that they are superior, as they assume themselves to be, to the authors and publishers whose views on the subject they refuse to take into consideration? It is a fact, they said, that "The Triumph of Death" is obscene, or it is a fact that it is not obscene, and they engaged to tell us which possible fact is the real fact. But there is the prior question—What is obscenity? In examining "The Triumph of Death" what standards of measurement were applied in order to determine the obscenity of non-obscenity of the book? If it was, as they said, a question of fact, then a jury should have sat upon the issue, but even a jury must either make its own opinions the standard or must use the opinions of the law-makers as a standard. It is a matter of opinion from first to last, that is, it is a matter of education, or of the lack of education. Each person's opinion is good for him or herself and for no one else.

Well, it has so happened that the Court of Special Sessions has acquitted Richmond & Co. and ordered the censor to give back to the publishers the books he took from them before the status of the work was determined by the judiciary. Comstock says he has been wronged—"The Triumph of Death" is obscene, and he can prove it by the definitions of obscenity formulated by "the highest courts of England and this country." He adds: "Furthermore, I have not seen a single lawyer that has examined the book who has not pronounced it a nasty work." That expression reveals the nastiest of minds. "The Triumph of Death" is artistic; it is a marvel of word-painting; it is not vulgar in any sense. Its analysis of human emotions is minute and merciless, and it is morbid, very morbid but it is delicate in phraseology and will not offend well-balanced minds by its frank treatment of love, passion, hate, jealousy, envy and avarice. Quite possibly without intending to do so, the author has graphically painted the hideousness of jealousy; the agonized shrieks of its victims ring out from his pages and echo for days after in the ears of the reader. The perusal of D'Annunzio's work must warn every thoughtful man and woman away from the wreck-strewn coats of the desert, land of Exclusive Possession.

George H. Richmond writes to the "Journal" that "ever since the famous decree of the Star Chamber publishers have got their rights by fighting for them." That is a truth that most American publishers and booksellers have forgotten. I hope the Messrs. Richmond will profit materially by this attack upon them; they made a stout fight and Comstock should have the comfort of seeing the "Triumph of Death" sell by the tens of thousands. Such a result might stiffen the backbones of other publishers.

The Legitimation League.

Many of Lucifer's readers are familiar with the name and endeavors of this society. For five years it has carried on an aggressive fight for freedom. With the beginning of the fifth year of its existence it takes on a still more radical tone than heretofore, as evinced in stating as its first object, "To educate public opinion in the direction of freedom in sexual relationships."

The Leeds "Evening Express" of April 2, devotes two and a quarter of its very long columns to a report of the annual meeting of the League. The speeches on the proposed amendment are very interesting, and it is to be regretted that Lucifer's limited space will not admit extended quotations from them.

The following are the newly-elected officers of the League: "President, Lillian Harman, Chicago, United States, America; Hon. Secretary, George Bedborough, 127 East Street Building, Manchester Square, London, W.; Treasurer, Louie Bedborough; Editor of Proceedings, Oswald Dawson, Harman Villa, Scacroft, near Leeds; Bankers, London and Midland Bank, Shaftesbury avenue, W.; Solicitor, Benjamin C. Pulleyne, Albion Walk Chambers, Leeds.

"Objects: 1. To educate public opinion in the direction of freedom in sexual relationships.

"2. To create a machinery for acknowledging offspring born out of wedlock, and to secure for them equal rights with legitimate children.

"Membership of the League is open to anyone who subscribes in writing to its objects, and contributes not less than two shillings sixpence per annum to its funds."

The retiring Treasurer, Gladys Dawson, made the gratifying report of receipts amounting to $1,560 with a balance of fifty dollars. Our co-laborers are to be congratulated on the effective work they are doing. Of the books which we advertise, "The Rights of Natural Children," "The Bar Sinister and Licit Love," "The Dawn of Civilization," and "When Love is Liberty and Nature Law," are among their publications.

The following are letters from the retiring Secretary, Mr. Dawson, and from the newly-elected Secretary, Mr. Bedborough:

"HARMAN VILLA, SEACROFT, NR. LEEDS, April 5, '97.

"DEAR LILLIAN HARMAN: You were unanimously and enthusiastically elected President of the Legitimation League at the first meeting of the fifth year of its existence held at the Holborn Restaurant, London, on Saturday the 3rd inst.

"You must bow to male supremacy for once and clearly understand you will not be allowed your own way—if that way be to decline to honor the League, unless you have come to disbelieve in it. . . .

"Our kindest regards to your respected father. Believe me,

"Very sincerely yours,

"OSWALD DAWSON."

"HOLBORN RESTAURANT, LONDON, April 7, '97.

"MY DEAR LILLIAN HARMAN: Mr. Dawson has already told you of the change of Secretaryship and that the League has now obtained a footing in the greatest city in the world. Fortunately, as you will see from the inclosed, Mr. Dawson has not retired from the active work of the League, and he will doubtless assist us in very many ways, besides those which appear on the surface. . . .

"My object in writing is to assure you of the perfect and unmistakable unanimity with which your election as President was carried. I sincerely hope you will accept the position, which is the only honor we are capable of offering you beyond the equally happy one of carrying out in the old country the principles you have done so much for in the States. The next meeting of the League will be on April 22, and we hold a public meeting at Holborn Restaurant (one of the best known places of public resort in London) on or about May 8. I trust that by the latter date I may be in a position to announce that you have decided to let us have our own way about the presidency. We are being steadily boycotted by the press, but from time to time I hope to send you records of our work.

"Please tell your father how much we all revere him and accept from me a hearty handshake, hearty as though miles of ocean did not separate us.

"Always yours in the cause,

"GEORGE BEDBOROUGH,

"Secretary of the Legitimation League."

Our English cousins of the League have been most earnest and enthusiastic supporters of our work in the interest of freedom of speech and press. Mr. Dawson has just published an important addition to the literature on the subject, entitled "Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs." The book contains an interesting account of difference between Mr. Dawson and J. H. Levy, the President of the Personal Rights Association. Mr. Dawson was a member of the Personal Rights Association, and offered to the "Journal" of the society advertisements of the League, which the President declined because he did not consider it best for the Personal Rights Association to be contaminated by even the paid advertisements of a movement which Mr. Levy characterized as in the interest of "so-called Free Love." Of one of Mr. Levy's speeches at a Personal Rights Association meeting, Mr. Dawson says:

"I regret Mr. Levy did not publish his speech in extenso. His report fails to mention the real gravamen of his antagonism. In indignant tones he pointed out to the members of the P. R. A. that they had been appealed to by me in the names of Ezra Heywood and Moses Harman, and these men, said Mr. Levy, had been sent to jail for using the United States mails for the transmission of indecent literature. The thrill of horror which should have run through the assembly at this revelation was absent. The peroration was a terrific anti-climax, and the Editor's sense of the value of freedom was most amusingly illustrated in the fact that the very copy of "Personal Rights," which reported this meeting, took as its text, at the head of the paper, a quotation from its own inaugural report, deprecating the confusion of the national conscience by the multiplication of technical offences, improperly ranked as crimes."

From the proceedings of another meeting, when the subject was up for discussion, we quote:

"Mr. Levy said, 'It is not simply because Mr. Oswald Dawson tendered me those advertisements, and moved a vote of censure, that he has been expelled from this Association. He has issued a circular, and in this circular, which is issued to members of this Association, he commends us to Ezra Heywood and Moses Harman, and he addresses us in the name of those people, who have been sent to jail in the United States of America for sending obscene literature through the mails.' Hereupon Mr. J. C. Spence ejaculated: 'So have a good many men.' Mr. Ashdown Jones: 'Bradlaugh was.' Mr. Levy resumed: 'That, to a very large extent, has been our reason for the action we have taken.' At this juncture, to the complete astonishment of everybody, the Chairman ruled Mr. Levy out of order, whereupon that gentleman sat down."

Aside from the personal aspect of the case, I very much regret Mr. Levy's limitation of personal rights to the standard of sexual conduct which he thinks best. For years I have admired his work. As "D." in Bradlaugh's "National Reformer," and as editor of the "Personal Rights Journal," he has rendered valiant service to liberty.

The remainder of the book is occupied by sketches of the lives and work of E. H. Heywood, Moses Harman, Lois Waisbrooker, and Lillian Harman. There are also fine full-page portraits of each of the four above named.

While there are, necessarily, a few inaccuracies of statement which may be referred to later, the work is very well done, as must be apparent when one considers the mass of conflicting newspaper reports, comments, etc., from which the brief histories were condensed.

The book is well printed on good paper, as are all of Mr. Dawson's works. It is bound in boards, and we will send it post-paid for 20 cents. Orders may be sent in now, and will be filled as soon as we receive a supply from England. L. H.

Some Counter-Thoughts.

BY J. MADISON HOOK.

Minds differ no doubt as much as forms and features of individuals. No two persons, perhaps, have the faculties and powers of mind developed to the same degree. Will power, for instance, is very weak in many persons and strong in a few. Given strong innate tendencies or impulses and a weak will and that person is very apt to become a victim of his organization. Many persons will say, in defense of that old exploded doctrine of the "free moral agency of man," "I have the will to do as I want to." Yes; but how many have the will to do what they don't want to? Most every one, for instance, has the power of spontaneous attention but how few have the power of voluntary attention. How many persons have the will to follow out any line of conduct which they may choose as the true and right one?

We are the creatures of heredity, education and environment. This is just as true as any other law of nature. The child who is brought onto the stage of action may become a victim of adverse circumstances and a weak hereditary will. I believe every child has a right to be well born, properly nourished, and educated so as to enable it to successfully cope with its environment. I stand for the rights of man and woman. I also demand the rights of the child. It is as much a crime to wrong a child as to is to wrong an adult. The consent of a child to an invasion of its rights is no just defense of the invader. I place the power of consent to such invasions with the parents of the child. I do this because I hold that the parents are equally responsible for the child's birth, sustentation and education. I consider sacred, beyond any mere contract, my obligations to my boy and girl. I do not claim that they are under any obligations to me for what I have done for them.

There comes a time, no doubt, when the child ought to be allowed its liberty. The line must be drawn somewhere. I am not in favor of the idea that puberty is the right time to turn a child out upon the world. For five or six years after puberty is the time when the desires and impulses are apt to rule the child to the exclusion of reason. I am inclined to the view that the parent ought to still foster and care for the child until it is fully developed mentally and physically. I can not place this age below eighteen to twenty years.

All the above is but preliminary to what I am going to say. While I am not in favor of law-enforced marriage as commonly understood, I am in favor of mating, or marriage. This is the only way, I see, in which the rights of the child can be secured. I believe in the home. It is to me the dearest spot on earth. I want love to rule the home and, in order to have love homes, I am in favor of marriage being a voluntary and mutual association. Woman ought to have full control of her own person and will have if love rules. When people pay more attention to the writings of such men as Fowler and Foote, love will remain longer to bless our homes instead of being turned to hate. Now here, I want to lay down a proposition; so long as a man or woman has the love of his mate, that mate will be true as steel. I defy any one to disprove its truth.

Now I claim that so long as this marriage is mutual, neither the man or woman has surrendered any rights. I have the right to form such a co-operation. It ought to be just as easy to get out of marriage as into it. Any property that has been earned under such co-operation ought to be shared equally by man and woman. Should the man die his property ought to go to the children and should the woman die her property ought to go to the children and not to the man as now too often happens. More justice in our sexual relations would greatly enhance domestic felicity.

This is my idea. I may be wrong. One thing is certain, I do not believe in any disease-breeding promiscuity. My whole nature revolts against the idea of promiscuous sexual intercourse without love and without parental responsibility. While man may be attracted by several I deny that any man can love more than one woman at a time. One can always tell which one he prefers. In our present state of society I would not be a party to parentage outside of the marriage I propose. Woman has a hard struggle under the best conditions. I would not place her up as a target for a hypocritical society.

I do not combat the rights of others but ideas that would deprive children of their natural rights and parental rights growing out of them. I am in favor of the eighteen year age of consent law. I shall defend my parental right to that age with my life. I am not a Prohibitionist, but I do not want any one to sell my child intoxicating liquors, for if he does I shall be on the warpath. On the other hand should I desert my child, and leave the woman to bear the burden alone I ought to be severely and unconditionally condemned.

Now Brother Harman turn on the light. I stand for human rights yet, and if there is any inconsistency I don't see it. What fault will you find with my ideas. Bear down hard. I'll not flinch. I am after you.

To the Liberal Public.

I wish to say to the Spiritualists, and to the Freethinkers generally, of Kansas and sister states, that I will have charge of the Dining Hall at Forest Park, Ottawa, during the six days' camp meeting of the Leavenworth Spiritualist Association, which is to be held here, beginning July 8, 1897. I am doing all I can to make this meeting a grand success, and wishing to save trouble and inconvenience to visitors and campers I offer to board those in attendance the entire six days for the small sum of two dollars. This will save the trouble of bringing provisions and cooking utensils. Those wishing tents or other accommodations can write me—with self-addressed stamped envelopes for reply, and I will cheerfully make all needed arrangements. Write soon about board, so that I may be prepared for all. Bring bedding. A large attendance is expected.

ETTA SEMPLE, Ottawa, Kansas.

[Forest Park is known far and near as one of the finest of encampment grounds in all the West. It is constantly occupied, during the camping season, by associations of state and national reputation. Etta Semple is President of the Kansas Freethought Association, and has had large experience in entertaining visitors to the annual encampments of that organization. Ottawa is near Kansas City, and is easy of access from Leavenworth, Topeka, St. Joseph and other chief cities of Kansas and Missouri. M. H.]

Rufus Wilson, a magazine writer, had four living wives when he was prosecuted for bigamy a short time since. Of course he had lied to all of them, and equally of course they must all be disappointed if they have depended upon him for support in the future. While the law continues to make it necessary for a man to appear to love no woman but his wife men will continue to lie to women and women will continue to be entrapped by the liars, and vice versa. Free varietists, men and women, are the only practical teachers of honesty in love relations. E. C. W.

Government and its Functions.

In this issue of Lucifer three or more of its correspondents have something to say about "government"—its rights, duties or functions. As these writers sign their own names the editor is in no tremor of anxiety lest the reader should infer that he concurs in the opinions or arguments set forth in the respective articles. Lucifer is individualistic in its methods of work; each writer being held responsible for his own views, and for the views of no other person. And this statement includes the editor and his immediate assistants. Each reader is supposed to be able to form correct conclusions without having the good or bad points of an article pointed out or commented upon.

While the space of Lucifer is too small for elaborate treatises on any question it is thought right and proper to devote some attention to governmentalism, or to questions of the rights and duties of "government," in its relation to such practical matters as the "currency" of commerce, the debt-paying medium, and in its relation to the reproductive instinct of human beings, including the duties of parents to each other and to their offspring.

"Define your terms," was the wise advice of Voltaire to all who essayed to compare ideas. Webster's definition of government is, "The exercise of authority; the administration of laws; the ruling power; control; direction; restraint; regulation; the administration; a body politic governed by one authority; a state," etc. etc. These definitions sufficiently voice the popular conception of what government is. It means "authority;" it means "ruling power;" it means force. It means the compulsory obedience of the governed, and it means the more or less irresponsible exercise of power by the persons who exercise the functions of government.

In the nature of things government means the negation, the denial of equality. There can be no equality between him who governs or rules another and him who is governed or ruled. The statement or assumption that a man is "free," or self-governing, because he assists, by the ballot or otherwise, to elect his rulers can easily be shown to be an illusion, a delusion, a superstition, "the baseless fabric of a dream!"

The domination of minorities by majorities under democratic or republican forms of government, if honestly practicalized, or practicable, would be a denial of liberty and equality to the governed,—no less so in principle than would be the domination of majorities by minorities. But it is quite safe to say that honest and truthful government by majorities has never been practicalized, nor practicable, on the planet earth, and never can be practicalized while nature and artificial laws and customs make human beings so unequal in prenatal endowment, so unequal in education, social position, wealth and other post-natal environment. In every so-called "free" government the few govern the many. All laws are made by the few and for the few. All laws are class laws, more or less pronounced—either in their inception or in their administration,—necessarily so since the administrators are human beings, with the passions and weaknesses of human beings. Laws and government are absolutely nothing aside from their human administrators.

Lucifer's position—if it be right and proper for one writer to say what that position is—Lucifer holds that the only rightful function of "government" is to help the individual citizen—woman and man alike—to defend her or his rights of person and of property. That is to say the only duty of government is "defendment,"—as some one has put it. This is tantamount to saying that the first duty of government is to cease to exist —as "government," for defense is not government at all, in the sense in which the word is commonly used.

Lucifer takes the ground that government has no rights,—no rights at all as government,—whether alienable or inalienable. Laws are but the opinions of men, and are less, not greater, than their makers. Only human beings have rights, as against human beings.

Laws, governments, may be destroyed without doing injustice to any one or anything. The old-time superstition that governments have rights, and that it is the duty of the citizen to surrender everything, even life itself in defense of his government, is one of the most debasing, most baneful of all superstitions, and yet so deeply rooted is this superstition that it will probably require many generations of educational influences, of hard iconoclastic work, to bring the average man and woman to see it in that light.

Hence the space from time to time given in Lucifer to the radical discussion of the governmental problem and to the issues that naturally arise out of that discussion.

Human Rights.

In so far as Friend Hook advocates Liberty and Responsibility as the only basis of conduct—or of morality, I heartily agree with him. When he says "I stand for human rights yet," he probably refers to a pamphlet he wrote and published some years ago, compared with which this last utterance of his seems something of a retraction. It now appears that he would call upon statute law to protect children under eighteen years of age, from the consequences of their own indiscretions—or what he would call such. If I understand it the Libertarian creed has no use for statute law, as a guide in morals, or as a protection against one's own follies. The Libertarian would have voluntary co-operative defense against aggression and invasion, but he would insist that children should early learn that their bodies are their own and that they are themselves the responsible guardians of their own persons. He would maintain that children should be taught all that is known in regard to sexology and reproduction, then let them know that while few mistakes are irreparable they should avoid all avoidable mistakes, as they value their future happiness.

The code of liberty coupled with responsibility—"every one has the right to do as he wills so long as he does not invade the equal right of others," cannot be taught too early in life. This applies to the sale and use of intoxicants, as well as to the gratification of all appetites and desires—whether normal or abnormal.

To oppose "law-enforced marriage," is to oppose marriage. It is a confusion of language to speak of "voluntary and mutual association" as marriage. All the rights and duties of marriage are defined and enforced by law,—as the law dictionaries will show, and law means force, and force is the negation of voluntaryism. To make it "as easy to get out of marriage as to get into it" is to destroy marriage. The essential element of marriage is that it is an exclusive union of two persons for life, and that only by death or for crime that the state considers sufficiently heinous, can the marriage be abrogated.

No writer in Lucifer's columns, so far as I know, has advocated "promiscuous sexual intercourse, without love and without parental responsibility," but while Mr. Hook is doubtless honest when he asserts, from his own experience, that no "man can love more than one woman at a time" he should not assume to speak for all other men, any more than he should assume to speak for all other men in matters of food or drink, or of religious belief. There may be bigotry and intolerance in sexual ethics as well as in any other department of human life.

"More justice in our sexual relationships," etc. This has been the head and front of Lucifer's offending all these years of conflict. We have contended for equal justice to woman and man and child. Justice to woman would give her absolute ownership and control over her person, not once in her life but at all times. It would give her the right to choose her helpers, her co-operators, whether one or more than one, and it would give her the sole ownership of her child, since all the real labor, pain and peril of child-production is hers. It would give to the child the right to be born well, and the right to be reared in an atmosphere of love and concord. It would give to man the absolute ownership of his own body, not once only in life, but at all times,—the right to do with his body whatever his conscience and best judgment may dictate. Justice in sex-relationships, means self-law, as in the management of all natural appetites and desires.

"I believe in the home." Yes, and so do we all. And in order that home should be heaven on earth it must be presided over by Freedom, Love and Wisdom. Where this trinity bears sway there will be happiness, whether the home be monogamic or not.

The cure for the evils of human society is more liberty, not more law, as many of Lucifer's old helpers seem to think.

Sociologic Lesson. No. XXXVIII.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

PRIMITIVE COMMERCE. The pioneer seeking his fortune in a new country, takes with him little property. He finds himself surrounded by others in like circumstances. Even barter is difficult, from the want of currency to pay the balances. These balances can be temporarily paid by any sort of promises to pay, which are certainly redeemable in due time in property of known value. No currency composed of such promises can possibly become inflated; for the promissory notes will be used in exchanges until no longer needed, and will then be presented for redemption and be cancelled. The whole difficulty lies in the redeemability; for whoever issues such a note must be able to make that so absolutely certain that it will not be doubted. Individuals may fail; banks may fail; but an honest government cannot fail.(1) The government can print any quantity of notes and insure them; but it cannot honestly issue them except for value received; and those who need them the most have no value to give. The demand for more currency comes from those who have not the means to secure payment of what they borrow; for there is an abundance of capital waiting for those who will secure its repayment with only such risk as they will assume and pay for.(2) It is sufficient here to emphasize the essential feature of redeemability, which is generally overlooked, and to say that in successful reorganization of commerce, founded upon adequate means, there can be no scarcity of currency.

It is a wide-spread fallacy that prices depend upon the volume of the currency.(3) This is only true locally and exceptionally; for as soon as there is time for adaptation the volume of the currency will conform to the demand for it, and prices will wholly depend upon the market value of the gold which is the basis of the currency.(4)

PER CONTRA.

Using the same privilege that is freely granted to Friend Parkhurst I will try briefly to present what seems to me a more rational view, of this question of finance and government.

(1.) An "honest government"—as such—is a bird of such rarity that it has probably never yet been seen. In the nature of things it is safe to assume that it never will be seen. Government of others means power to rule and to rob. Government is the men who administer it. If a man is honest before becoming a ruler the possession of power over his fellowmen speedily makes him dishonest. Nothing is so corrupting as the possession of power over others, and it is commonly the ambitious and covetous who seek power over their fellowmen.

(2.) "Only such risk!" The risks assumed by the borrower class when the capitalist has "government" to back him, have been well illustrated in the fate of those who borrowed when wheat was two dollars per bushel, and cotton fifteen to twenty cents per pound. Besides the annual interest,—which in the course of a few years amounts to more than the nominal principal, and for which no equivalent is rendered by the lender —the debt must be paid in an appreciated currency which means depreciated labor products. So that when, through misfortune of any kind, payment has been delayed a dozen or more years the risk of the borrower means compulsory payment of his debt two or three times over in real value; else it means bankruptcy and ruin. The management of the national debt, which debt the producing classes did not make but which they have been compelled to pay more than once—in labor products without diminishing the load,—is also a good illustration of the risk of the debtor class when government stands at the back of the creditor and compels payment in a currency whose change in "redeemability" from cheap to dear, was made by the creditor class without consulting the debtor.

(3.) It is a self-evident proposition that prices do depend mainly upon the volume of currency in circulation.

(4.) When government (our rulers) takes its robber hands out of the pockets of the people; when currency, like other commodities, is left to the legitimate operation of supply and demand, then "the volume of currency will really conform to the demand for it." Until then "the market value of gold" can and will be pushed up and down the scale to suit the greed of the parasitic classes, and the currency based on gold—or other law-enforced "basis," will also be cornered and restricted to suit the greed of the same privileged parasites.

Privileged commodities make privileged classes among men.

A monopoly of the issue of money by government authority means the enslavement of the producing classes to the non-producing or money-manipulating classes.

Government control of money and of land,—the two being inseparable as the Siamese twins,—are all that are needed to give a so-called democratic or republican government the worst features of a paternalistic despotism, of the monarchal or oligarchic types.

Friend Parkhurst has given a concise and honest presentation of the gold-standard, restricted-currency, argument. I have tried, in as few words as possible, to give the other side of the question. Our readers can take their choice, or adopt neither, as seemeth good to them.

Rights and Functions of Governments.

BY LEROY BERRIER.

I hope the editor and readers of Lucifer know I do not cherish the spirit of intolerance. I desire to see every human being enjoy equally every natural right. Governments and their laws are made for this purpose; that is, they should be.

To enjoy a special privilege is the universal desire—so strong that it has perverted in many instances the true function of governments. This fact, however, does not constitute a valid reason for the abolition of governments, and our aim should be to hold the government to its natural function, the restriction of special privileges in any form. Individual desires when they ask for special privileges, must not be gratified.

There is a tendency with us all to exaggerate ourselves and get into a condition wherein we are not capable of drawing the lines between natural rights and special privileges. There are also many who do not care whether they innovate(?) the rights of others or not.

I believe this is especially so in the matters of sex relations and reproduction. Governments interfere with these relations simply because they are the source of the race which if polluted or abused, innovates(?) equal rights.

I cannot see why a man or woman should be allowed to bring children into the world just because they so desire or can not avoid it and still be able to gratify their desire of sexual pleasure. Suppose they are irresponsible, and do not provide or care for their children, and I, who have my own to care for, but as a member of society, am forced to help care for theirs, is it not granting them a special privilege?

Friend Harman, I fear you do not give due weight to individual selfishness in this matter. Again, with no government or social co-operation, might is right.

[The evils of irresponsible parenthood are confessedly very great, but their cure is not to be found in governmental control of parenthood. Under freedom these evils would be self-correcting, but under government, as now, they are self-perpetuating. "Might is right," now under government, and might has far greater control over right than it would have under voluntary "social co-operation." Government itself is "privilege" personified, "invasion" incarnated and made perpetual. See article on "Government and its Functions," and replies to correspondents in this issue. M. H.]

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

"'Will you trust me?'

"One look into the clear eyes told me that it would be safe, and I only nodded my head. I could not trust myself to speak. I hardly knew how it happened, but in a few moments more I found myself seated at his side in a closed carriage, and that night I slept safely housed, with a little confidence in mankind restored.

"You know the rest. I told you the story yesterday; of how he came to love me and I him, until our love glorified our lives. Never until the darkly passionate woman stood before me did I know that another had a stronger claim upon him than I. He did not know through what chance she had become possessed of his secret. He felt sure she cared little, only it gave her a chance to empty the poison vials of her temper and spleen in a manner that she was conscious would strike me in a vital spot.

"'She thinks to part us, loved one,' he said, 'but she shall not succeed. I will not sacrifice the only bright spot that makes my life worth living. You, my darling, have redeemed me. You have taught me the bliss of the love of a true woman. You have made a new being of me, and to you I belong; while you are mine by the might and power of that holy love that you bear me.'

"O, Imelda, forbear to judge me from the high pinnacle of morality and purity upon which I know you stand. Although I had made up my mind to disappear out of his life—that he should not know what had become of me,—but this one last night I wanted to be happy, happy in the present hour and in the feeling that he was mine and I his. I would not think of the morrow and what it would bring. I only gave myself up to the hour and to my love, and when the bright sun of another day had risen he still held me so closely in his arms that it seemed he meant never to release me.

"'Have patience, my own one,' he said, 'if you should not see me for some time. I will have much to arrange, but when all shall have been attended to I will fly to you, never again to leave you; for I cannot, I will not give you up.'

"I thought my heart would break, as he held me in his arms, whispering to me his plans of hope and happiness. But I forced back the scalding tears and with smiling lips kissed him goodby. I stood at the doorway and watched him out of sight.

"'Out of sight!' Could it have been out of mind as well, it would then not have been so hard to bear. I re-entered my room, threw myself upon my bed and wept myself to sleep.

"Long hours I lay thus. When at last I awoke the sun was high in the heavens; my limbs were weary and my heart heavy, but I knew I had work to do, the hardest part of which was to write Owen a letter wherein I should bid him farewell, as I thought it better to part than that I should be the cause of his ruin. I had some money, money he had given me, and many valuable jewels and trinkets. To me they were possessed of a double value as they were the gifts of his love. I packed a trunk with such things as it seemed necessary that I should take with me; selecting the plainest of my dresses. Then having sent old Aunt Betty on an errand, I managed to procure a wagon to take my few belongings to the ferry and thence to the depot and—— I have never seen him since.

"It is only two short months ago, but to me it seems ages. Not caring whither I was going, as all the world was alike to me, I procured a ticket with scarce an idea where it would take me. My trunk checked, I patiently waited for my train. For two hours I never stirred, gazing fixedly at my tightly clasped hands. Had not the strangeness of my demeanor attracted the attention of an old gentleman who kindly asked me where I was going, I might have missed my train. He doubtless saw something in my face that was not quite satisfactory for he asked to see my ticket and found that my train would be due in a few minutes. Taking me under his immediate care he saw that I was made comfortable, as, fortunately, he was to take the same train, and was bound for the same destination.

"How I reached Harrisburg I suppose I shall never know, for one day I awoke to find myself in a hospital bed, my face wan and thin and too weak to lift my head. I was told that I had been brought there four weeks before, delirious with fever, and that I constantly required the care of several nurses. But youth was in my favor and I soon regained health and strength, and in two weeks more I was discharged. It was the old gentleman who had befriended me on the train who had also caused me to be taken where I would be cared for during my illness, and through his kindness it was that I found my belongings when able again to care for myself.

"It had been just two weeks since my release from the hospital when the accident occurred that brought me here. If my thoughts had been with me I don't think it could have happened. But Owen's image still lives in my heart. It is not so easy to obliterate it therefrom, right or wrong. I still love him."

Here Cora's overwrought feelings again gave way, and she sobbed as if her heart would break. Imelda gently placed her arm about the weeping girl's neck and pressed her against her own bosom. Tenderly she brushed her hair and kissed the tear-wet eyelashes. With a quick unexpected motion Cora caught the hand that was caressing her cheek and pressed it to her heaving breast.

"Can you still find room for me in your pure and stainless heart? Can you still love me? But oh, you can't understand how hard it was to give him up. Indeed! indeed! I have tried so hard to overcome this love, but it is stronger than I. It overcomes me."

Imelda bent and kissed the quivering lips. "Poor little sister! Have I been so cold and merciless in the past as to cause you to believe that I am so small and narrow as to heap censure upon this bowed head? to still farther lacerate your bleeding, aching heart? No, no! you poor child. If in the past you have been childishly wayward I may not always have rightly understood you. If you have dared to fly in the face of society, of man-made laws, it is you who have been the sufferer, and when the sweetest boon that comes to woman's life was held out to you and you were brave enough to grasp it and to bask in its glorious sunshine, I certainly cannot condemn you. I had not dreamed that the material of so grand a woman lay hidden beneath the surface of that saucy, independent child. A grand and glorious woman indeed is my sister Cora, and I am proud of her!"

Cora's great hazel eyes were opened wide with astonishment. As if by magic the tears ceased to flow; her face grew deathly white; huskily she whispered,

"What is it you mean, Imelda? I do not understand. I have heard your words but have not caught their import. The Imelda that I know regarded a life such as I have been leading a deadly, hideous sin, and your words almost imply that——I ——have done right."

"They do imply it, darling! I think you have been brave and true and strong. It might be, though, that it was because you were not so strongly bound, as I, by the fetters of prejudice, but I also am getting rid of these fetters and hope soon to be a free woman, and in the measure that I am gaining liberty I understand better what it means to others to be deprived of that precious boon. Sister mine, my eyes have been opened to many evils existing in this world, and the starvation of woman's sex-nature until marriage, when the starvation generally changes to surfeit and sex-slavery is one of the greatest evils that this world knows. A few men are intelligent and noble enough to understand this; men who suffer almost as much from this accursed system as do most women, and, little girl, your Owen was one of these noble men. After all you have told me about yourself and him I am rather surprised you did not dare the world and claim your own."

"Imelda! This from——you! I wanted to save him from himself. I know he would never have given me cause to rue it had I entrusted myself, my life, to his care. He was too noble, too true for that. But you know the law gives him to that other woman, and how it would have hurt him in the society wherein he moves and in which he ranks so high."

"I understand. Love blinded you to your own interests while you sought to guard only his, forgetful of the fact that every pang that was torturing your own heart would find an echo in his. Oh, what a horrible structure is society; built as it is upon the quivering hearts of poor bleeding humanity!"

Cora listened in open-eyed wonder to the words that fell from the lips of her sister. To her unsophisticated ears they sounded like rank treason, only that she knew that Imelda's mind and heart were not capable of treason. Long and earnestly therefore did the elder sister talk to the younger one, trying to make clear her views and theories, and as Cora caught their import a new hope, like sweet balm, crept into the weary heart. Was she then not the loathesome and vile thing the world would have her believe herself to be? Could it really be true that love, soul-elevating, ennobling and purifying love, does not need the sanction of state and church to give it those redeeming qualities? O, how like another being she would feel if the sweet consciousness could be hers that she was not unclean and defiled; but that her love was just as pure and holy as in its highest, noblest sense it ever could be.

VARIOUS VOICES.

E. F. Ruedebusch, Mayville, Wis.:—I was very sorry to hear that you were obliged to suspend publication of "Our New Humanity," but that is better, of course, than to endanger the existence of Lucifer.

I inclose three dollars for the publication fund of Lucifer. "And still we hope for better times coming!"

James Beeson, Hytop, Ala.:—I would like the marked books in list No. 654 of Lucifer, but am hardly able to take two copies.

[If you, an old subscriber, received a copy of Lucifer with a mark over the offer of premiums to new subscribers it was probably meant as a hint that if you want some of the premium books you could order a copy of Lucifer sent on trial to some friend and secure the premium book for your own reading. A small extra investment—only twenty-five cents, would do this. M. H.]

A. C. Schindler, San Francisco, Calif.:—Inclosed find a two-dollar post office money order, for which please send a thirteen weeks trial subscription to each of the following seven addresses. Also send to my address the following publications: "The Story of an African Farm," "Black Beauty, The Famous Autobiography of a Horse," "The Duchess of Powysland," "The Great Taboo," "Tales of the French Revolution," "John's Way," "Motherhood in Freedom." If there is anything left of the two dollars you can send a marked copy of Lucifer of April 7 with "A Free Man's Creed" in it (I think it is excellent) to the following addresses inclosed herewith. All may not fall in stony places.

Ed. Secrest, Randolph, Kan.:—I owe you an apology for my neglect to renew subscription to Lucifer. I hereby enclose one dollar for the continuation of same for another year. I hope your change of base from Kansas to the great western metropolis has been of benefit to you individually as well as to the cause you so ably and courageously represent. Your headquarters are certainly more centrally located, and your surroundings and environments more helpful and congenial. While I take comparatively little interest in so-called Free Loveism and Sexology generally, I like your liberal, up-to-date views in theology as well as politics, and therefore want to encourage your facile pen in the noble championship of Free Thought and Free Speech, a Free Press, a common humanity, and for the elevation and betterment of men and woman. Long life and success to you and Lucifer.

Arthur Baker, Thornton Heath, Croydon, Eng.:—Herewith two dollars for which please send me all the numbers of "Our New Humanity" hitherto issued, and if there is any surplus put it down as a subscription to Lucifer. Mariette's story, "Isabel's Intention," in No. 4 of "Our New Humanity" struck me immensely, and I am going to try and get it reprinted in England. Can you tell me who Mariette is, for she seems to me a very powerful and sympathetic writer and one whose light should not be hid under a bushel (if you will excuse my comparing "Our New Humanity" to a bushel); and besides I know some people who have acted more or less on the lines that Isabel indicates. I hope you will continue to struggle on bravely in spite of all persecution. Some of us over here have our persecutions too.

[Yes, "Isabel's Intention" is a story of great merit, drawn from actual life, no doubt. The identity of the author is the editor's secret, but doubtless the writer will not long remain unknown to fame, and her real name will then appear. This story is but one of the attractions of the number of the Magazine named by our British correspondent. M. H.]

Mrs. T. Hughes, Pittsburg, Pa.—Lucifer No. 653 arrived today, and I have read a "Free Man's Creed," and "H. L. Green on Marriage." Really I don't know how to express myself. Mr. Green must have been very much afraid of th effects of your article on his readers (cut and weakened as it was) to find it necessary to so twist and misrepresent your meaning as he has done. Verily the path of the reformer is not strewn with roses; terribly up-hill work it is always, but why the parties most interested in any reform,—those who would be most benefited by such reform—should always be its most bitter enemies, is what puzzles me.

I cannot think that Mr. Green is so thick-headed as he would make us believe. He understands you well enough, and in his inmost heart he must admit that you are right, but expediency doubtless points the other way. Hence the stand he takes. But the woman whose heart hungers for that which her husband's home no longer can give—love and happiness—that she should be the one who cries out loudest against a reform that would give her freedom, love and happiness, this is hardest of all to understand. And yet it is easy enough to understand when we look for the causes. The church and the customs of the ages have so enthralled and enslaved her that she has no power to break her chains. She has so long been accustomed to these chains that she thinks she cannot live without them.

Chas. C. Millard, Wichita, Kan.:—Until quite recently, I certainly had no intention of writing anything for publication in Lucifer; but circumstances alter cases. In my letter quoted by Mr. Mathers I asked if he would be willing to associate with a woman who "ignored the rite of marriage and the customs of society, and was raising children on the free love plan." I did not intimate that the woman would be "immoral" on account of so doing; and I certainly did not intend to convey the idea that I would associate with a woman whom I considered immoral. I meant that I would admire the courage of such a woman—whatever I might think of her judgment, and would recognize her socially as an equal, if she were in other ways worthy, not off in some other state or city, but right here in Wichita; and then I asked what Mr. and Mrs. Mathers would do in such a case. By looking up Mr. Mathers' article in a late number of Lucifer the reader can see that I am still waiting for an answer. The one given is evasive, and leaves me in the dark.

I deny that I am tinctured with orthodox—or any other kind of—superstition, much to speak of; but what I deem advisable to advocate as President of a Freethought Society is another matter, for all things which are lawful to me are not expedient. Like the Irishman in the storm at sea who prayed that if the Lord would save him that time he would never ask another favor; if you will give this a place in your somewhat radical paper I will not trouble you again unless another storm should move me thereto.

The Reason.

BY C. L. JAMES.

(Suggested by Mattie Hurson's letter in Lucifer, No 653.)

HE.
Love, what makes our love complete?
SHE.
That other love is also sweet.
HE.
Nay, for now we both may know
That this with each was always so:
It ever made our kiss more rare
With sweetest kisses to compare:
Kisses such as love, when free,
Breathed in balm for thee and me.
SHE.
Kisses such as first love sips
In nectar from the virgin lips,—
This ever made our love delight,
That love flowed free as flows the sight—
Kisses like—explain them thou—
Like what I may scarce avow.
HE.
Kisses such as burst like levin
Rending bare the blaze of heaven.
SHE.
Ah! I faint for joy and wonder
When their pow'r explodes in thunder!
HE.
Gentle drops from those sweet eyes
Were like those in clearing skies.
SHE.
But calms may make a sailor die.
HE.
And love wax faint in fairest eye.
SHE.
There needs no magic wand to move
Such storms as are not those of love.
HE.
What magic then restored that bliss
So easy lost, since here it is?
SHE.
Freedom gave it back to thee;
Freedom gave it back to me.
In others' arms we found again,
Through bliss, our owe love, lost in pain.
HE.
When loosened from thine arms, how sweet
His love, released from his, to meet!
SHE.
When folded in his arms; what bliss,
To claim her gladly unclaimed kiss!
HE.
With what renewed desire, amain,
I clasped thee to my breast again!
SHE.
'Twas candor taught there's naught so sweet,
As glowing from thine arms to meet.

Anarchistic Doings in Chicago.

BY REV. SIDNEY HOLMES.

It is amusing to see one set of governmentalists—the voters of Chicago—denouncing another set of governmentalists—the state legislature—as anarchists.

Corporation Counsel Thornton finds it an easy task to turn the Chicago's swivel service law in any direction to suit the whim of his master, Mayor Harrison.

Think of the great Chicago daily newspapers preaching anarchy! Yet every one of them is denouncing government, as represented by the present state legislature.

Literally speaking, an anarchist is a person who is opposed to government. The present Illinois legislature seems to have turned nearly the entire population of Chicago into temporary anarchists.

Do the "good" citizens of Chicago who are opposing governmental invasion in the form of the passage of the Humphrey bills by the legislature at Springfield, realize that their conduct is anarchistic?

Why doesn't Governor Tanner call out the militia to suppress the mass-meetings now being held in Chicago at which the government is openly denounced by such erstwhile "patriots" as John W. Ela, John M. Hamline and Aldermen Harlan and Kent?

Julius S. Grinnell represented the government in the prosecution of the so-called anarchists after the Haymarket riot. As general counsel for a Chicago street railway company Mr. Grinnell is still representing the government in trying to induce a willing legislature to extend the franchises of the Chicago street railways fifty years.

All the time John P. Altgeld was governor of the state of Illinois he was denounced by the republican press as an "anarchist." At a mass meeting last week when he denounced the government, as represented by the present Illinois legislature, he was cheered to the echo by some of the very men who had denounced him when he was governor.

If the Humphrey bills, extending the franchises of Chicago street railways, should become laws and Alderman Harlan should address an indignation meeting and use the expression "Throttle the law!" (for he used words of similar import at a mass meeting in Chicago Tuesday, April 20,) would he be subjected to the same punishment as was imposed on Samuel Fielden? If so, and if Governor Tanner should pardon him, would Tanner be denounced as an anarchist, as Governor Altgeld was for pardoning Fielden?

Just as the friends of freedom, who are consequently enemies of governmental invasion, have begun to make the name "anarchist" a title of honor rather than of infamy, the governmentalists seek to appropriate the name for themselves. Alderman John H. Harlan, late independent candidate for mayor of Chicago, said in a mass meeting one night last week: "Anarchists are those men who defame the law by making the very law itself the instrument of violating the liberties of the people, of stealing the property of the people." In what other manner were the liberties of the people in this country ever violated? Stick to your own name, John. Such men are governmentalists, not anarchists.

From Prostitution and Marriage to Love.

(Programme for a new chapter in White's "Warfare of Science with Theology.")

BY C. L. JAMES.

Prostitution is the most ancient of primitive institutions. Among the lowest savages, with whom no other has taken form, the women are slaves, belonging, like other chattels, to the horde in common; and no woman is allowed to refuse any man satisfaction. This of course is a kind of prostitution; but the growing science of historical criticism shows it to be that primitive stock, whereof prostitution as practiced among more civilized nations is merely an attenuated branch. It is, of course, older than marriage; which arose as follows:

When a warrior of one horde captured a woman from another, he claimed her as his peculiar acquisition. Since this was contrary to the primitive communism, it was resisted. The captors, being usually great chiefs, in a measure got their way, but only by yielding many points to the demands of the multitude. The woman was first ravished by all the warriors, (this was done among the Indians quite lately); then, on paying a fee, the captor was held to have extinguished the tribe's right in her. Kissing the bride, and treating on marriage, are relics of these customs.

It was a fixed rule that a wife could only be obtained from a foreign tribe and by capture. But when neighboring tribes became practically one nation through intermarriages, capture was so much less convenient than purchase as to be evaded. A form denoting it remained, to save the woman's kinsfolk's reputation; and such forms have continued in all countries to the present day. (See Lubbock "Origin of Civilization," and McLennan "Primitive Marriage.")

But practically girls were now sold, not taken. The rule that marriage must be out of one's own tribe (clan) gradually became obsolete, because clanship itself, though universal among primitive people, is an institution which declines in the process of social evolution. Those women whom individuals did not buy for wives continued to be prostituted. Throughout antiquity, daughters of free parents were always "given in marriage" at a reasonable age. The prostitutes were mostly common slaves; in some countries, as India, they were the women of a particular clan; but everywhere a girl who formed a connection for herself was held to have fallen into their ranks, and required to live as they did.

It is evident both institutions were forms of female slavery, but prostitution in some visible respects is the more open and shocking of the two. Accordingly it became rather unpopular where decline of polygamy had caused women to be somewhat more highly regarded than formerly. This was chiefly in Europe; for polygamy is inconsistent with the European policy of concentrating landed estates. But the Jews, for a similar reason, also discontinued polygamy somewhat early; so among them too, after the captivity, women were in a measure exalted and prostitution was unpopular.

Among other nations, however, especially the Hindoos, the Phoenicians, and the Syro-Egyptian races generally except the Jews, the older institution was highly honored, and formed an important part of religion. Now the ideal of contemplative souls in any country is always the reverse of the actual practice. In these very countries, therefore, in India and in Syria, arose the great ascetic religions, Buddhism and Christianity, which taught that sexual indulgence is at best a necessary evil—that all forms, easily recognized as gross, like prostitution, are totally to be abhorred.

It would be unfair not to say that primitive Christianity, endowed as yet with something of its founder's spirit, did a little to weaken both marriage and prostitution. Exalting celibacy above both, it provided a refuge for a few wives, as Rhadegonda, innumerable maidens, and some prostituees—Magdalen, Afra, Pelagia, etc. It wholly discredited the barbarous laws, "once a prostitute always a prostitute," which had been universal in antiquity. But it wholly missed the true remedy of setting women entirely free. Ascetic, aiming to restrain sexual indulgence; dogmatic, pursuing its aims by positive precepts and punishments; and wholly destitute of the scientific spirit; it destroyed the liberal divorce laws which had grown up under the Roman Empire, and which continued in Provence until the thirteenth century. Having thus riveted the chains of marriage, it was soon compelled to make those of prostitution heavier. For prostitution can exist—it did, in the earliest period, without marriage; but marriage cannot possibly exist without prostitution.

Those Christian sovereigns, like Louis IX. of France (St. Louis), and, long after him, Maria Theresa, who actually put down prostitution for a time, soon found they were breaking up marriage by the same process, and reluctantly repealed their ordinance.

Thus even to the prostitutes, Christianity proved worse than paganism. Some pagan systems had very consistently honored them, as holy women devoted to making others happy. Christians, from St. Paul to Leap-frog Parkhurst, have usually had no remedy for their misery to suggest but treating them more cruelly than before.

The better era began with the Reformation, which broke th power of the Church. The martyr archbishop, Cranmer, was the first Englishman to propose a liberal divorce law, such as his country has adopted in our time. Two centuries later, Emanuel Swedenborg announced, without opposition, the sublime truth that love alone sanctifies sexual intercourse. He made the enormous mistake of supposing that love, to be genuine, must needs be dual; but it was a timely mistake, for a gospel of variety would not then have been listened to; and those whom he set to hunting "affinities" soon discovered that there are none.

Then the French Revolution introduced rational methods of legislation. Robert Owen, and others who imbibed its spirit, procured, in different countries, laws about divorce which realized the hopes of Cranmer, Milton, Swedenborg, and other premature reformers. The Spiritualists popularized and liberalized Swedenborg's ideas.

I feel a delicacy in pursuing the subject further, because of the quorum pars fin. But the later reformers treated the matter scientifically. They showed that nothing but harm could come of trying to make people love wisely by law. They exposed the origin of marriage and its inseparable alliance with prostitution. They organized to secure the rights of illegitimate children.

The Church's opposition was fierce and bitter. She declaimed against divorce. She stultified herself by condemning Swedenborg's conception of love. She persecuted the exposers of her shame under the pretence that their wr ps were "obscene." I have no doubt the future historian w relate that when marriage and prostitution were destroyed, she claimed the credit of destroying them, and quote Jesus to prove "that they who shall be counted worthy to receive that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage."

A Pitiful Experience.

BY REV. JESSE H. JONES.

Some time ago I received a brief note by a round-about way, saying that the writer had seen a letter of mine printed years ago in Dr. Foote's "Health Monthly," in which I spoke of the seat of spiritual love as in the chest (or heart region), and asking me to write. It was also requested that I should send the letter enclosed to a certain other party. I did as requested, and received a long letter of personal experience of such a nature that I have concluded to make some extracts and follow with comments.

"Allow me to give you a little sketch of my life. I was born in a pure home. My mother was converted at the age of eleven, and was a very pure and modest woman. My father was one of the purest of men; "pure as a woman," some hav said of him. I married at eighteen; and here is where the wonder began. I could not be sensual. I was converted at the age of fifteen, and am of a sensitive and poetical and spiritual nature; and early began to question,—Why, why were some things so; when I did not want them that way? It took me so long to learn that God did not want it so either.

"I heard from my husband that I never should have married, when I had such feelings. I wanted my husband's love; and did not want always to be receiving for my caresses sensual gratification. I was told that was what I was for. Believe me, I never was rebellious in my heart; only longing and questioning. I was told I would be a divorced wife in a hurry, did I refuse to do my duty; and that that was what God intended me for. I was willing, if that was God's way; but O! how could it be? For my soul was so hungry, and I loathed the thought of gratifying passion. I could see how inconsistent it was to expect young men and women to be pure, when married people were not."

Then follows a brief account of a deep, extraordinary and precious, religious experience, which I much desire to print, if only I could find a place where it would be acceptable, the outcome of which she gives in these words:

"God showed me, under an awful test, that I did not have to yield my poor body to my husband any more. He could or would not see as I did; and I was willing to do or suffer any thing to be kept for God. I have four children, and one grandchild; and for five years have been His temple, not to be defiled. It is eight years since I had the experience I write of.

"Of course, as it is, I am useless to a husband who cares for flesh; and I cannot tell you how alone I live. I have not one Christian friend that lives a life of continence. I have talked to a hundred; and oh! the sad women I know, longing, as I did; and none dare to trust Him; and still suffer on."

Much more she writes; but all her experience comes under religious forms, so that it is not such as to be acceptable to many readers of this periodical. And my heart says, Will the time ever come when liberals will be so really liberal that they can receive the expression of the experience of such a poor, suffering woman in the way natural to her, without offense? I only add that she says, "I belong to the Methodist church."

This is the kind of a case that makes a true man's blood boil. A Godly, Christian woman, pure in heart and gentle in life, is used by her husband, as no male wild beast uses its mate. This base, shameful, outrageous, cruel violence cannot be over denounced. To think that lions, tigers, wolves, bears, deer, moose, elk, cattle, sheep, swine, every kind of living thing, wild or tame, that suckles its young,—there is not one kind of them all but the male treats his female so much better than this man treats his female, that to call him a beast is to insult every real beast that lives. Human speech does not possess a word that can fitly characterize such a man, unless it be to call him a monster.

And the woman is so bestead, that, although on account of her bodily ailments, this man does not now wreak himself upon her, yet she dare not have a letter to herself come through the post office directly; but she has to have it come to the house of a compassionate woman neighbor, and be brought by hand to her.

And this is not by any means the worst of it. The worst is that there is no public opinion against such conduct. Except the outbursts of some occasional individual, all society is silent: or if any speak, the only word spoken is to tell the unfortunate to keep her sufferings to herself, and not spread abroad her shame before the world. And lest it should be thought that this is some solitary case, I will add that facts which have come to my knowledge seem to make it probable that there is one such sufferer to every five hundred persons in this land.

Some time there must and will come a movement, in which men and women will share together, to establish an order of genuine humans on the earth, every member of which will have to be right and clean in sex, and in which it will be impossible for a man to be a member who is baser, viler, crueler than any beast is capable of being; but in which every man will be a true human, "giving honor to the wife as to the weaker vessel."

A true human is one who walks according to the spirit and not according to the flesh, who puts the wife in control of sex according to the universal law of nature, who counts parentage as the supreme essential outcome of sex, and makes all else subsidiary thereto, and who has love, reverence and honor for woman. When will this company of true humans gather, to teach with all their might the true life of sex, to live it, and to make a safe retreat in the world for all who wish to live in that upright and holy way?

The church tells of a Glad Tidings which it has to proclaim to the human race; and that message is real and true. But the gladdest glad tidings which can be proclaimed in the ears of mankind on the face of the earth today is, that the time has come to break the yoke of man from off the neck of woman, and let oppressed womanhood go free. The time is fulfilled; and now, now, now, the supreme word is, to make woman free in her womanhood; and the work of all others in the earth is to bring this word, as the word of the Most High, to every man, until it shall pierce as a sword to the core of his heart,—until no man can bear the baseness and degradation of saying to his woman, what the husband told of above said to his,—until the true humanhood in sex shall develop into the universal way of life of mankind in all our land, and finally throughout the globe.

Readers, every soul of you, according to your gifts and powers, spread, spread the good word.

Continence and Contracepts.

BY AMY LINNETT.

The friend at Mr. Harman's elbow voices my sentiments as to Mrs. Waisbrooker's theories. I want to express my opinions, because I am not sure that that friend was a woman, and I can take one woman's standpoint.

Let me say that I have known men perfectly willing to practice continence if the woman so wished, but does Mrs. Waisbrooker claim that a normal woman will so wish? I know that there are numbers of women at the present time who contemplate sex relations with abhorrence and disgust, and we cannot be surprised at this when we come to learn their conditions of life. On the other hand, many of our younger radical women are among those who are not ashamed to avow the deliciousness of their sex, as Walt Whitman puts it.

To argue against contracepts as "unnatural" is a mere begging of the question. I do not admit they are, except in the same sense that anesthetics or balloons are. To say anything is "unnatural" is usually the method of a person who has no real argument to advance. I should myself deplore the taste of a woman who preferred self-relief to the use of a suitable contracept, because I should think it a form of self-sacrifice wholly without justification. That is a matter for individual judgment, but I have great faith as to the ultimate outcome.

I have been appealed to within the last week by a believer in Diana methods for the name of some firm dealing in contracepts. She wished the information "for a friend."

Contracepts are the only means whereby some women can avoid having children, and should be recognized as such by our "continence" advocates. It is not every woman who can, like Nora, leave husband and children and face the world alone. The alternatives are unwelcome children or limitation of the family.

Perhaps the fact that I am not yet thirty instead of seventy has something to do with my feeling in this matter. I want it distinctly understood that the free woman does not "consent to unnatural sex relations" (Mrs. Waisbrooker's expression for the use of contracepts) "in order to please" her lover, but in order to please herself. One-sided relations cannot be satisfactory. It is only what is mutually desired that will satisfy the self-respecting woman.

"The True Life of Sex."

For most of Lucifer's readers no help is needed in the way of editorial comment upon anything that appears in our columns. The subject of sex—the most important factor in human life, human happiness or human misery, is one that is not new to the majority of those to whom our Light-Bearer makes its weekly visits. But to those who have paid little or no attention to sexologic questions it may be well, occasionally, to insert a few running comments from the standpoint of the editorial staff.

Among the noteworthy articles in this week's Lucifer is one entitled "A Pitiful Experience," consisting of extracts from a letter written to Rev. Jesse H. Jones, with some comments thereon by that gentleman himself. Mr. Jones is known to many of our readers as an able writer upon sex ethics and upon race-culture, from a Christian point of view; and it may not be amiss to add just here, that though a Christian minister he is not a "dead-head." He does not ask for privileges because of his clerical profession or ministerial title, but pays his subscription, and therefore has the same kind of right to space in Lucifer that our "liberal" contributors possess.

The first and most noticeable feature in the comments appended to the "Pitiful Experience" is the substantial agreement between Mr. Jones and Lucifer's central thought, or main contention, which agreement he states in his closing paragraph, "The gladdest of glad tidings which can be proclaimed in the ears of mankind on the face of the earth today is, that the time has come to break the yoke of man from off the neck of woman and let oppressed womanhood go free."

No better statement can be made of the demand that Lucifer has been making for many years than is this noble utterance from a man who still calls himself a minister of the faith whose leading apostles, and whose so-called "divine revelation," have done more, perhaps, than all other agencies to forge and rivet the chains of slavery upon the body and soul of woman, and place both body and soul under the irresponsible domination of man.

Yes, Brother Jones, "the time is fulfilled, and now, now, NOW, the supreme word is to make woman free in her womanhood; and the work of all others in the earth is to bring this word as the word of"—whom or of what? If Mr. Jones had said, "as the word of enlightened human reason," or "as the word of evoluted humanity," some of us could have understood him better and could have endorsed without reserve his "banner cry," in its entirety, but the word "Most High," puts us on our guard, and compels us to ask, 'Whose 'Most High?'" or "What do you mean by the 'word of the 'Most High'?"

If Brother Jones has a "Most High" of his own making—if it be true that every man makes his own god, then the being idealized, or idolized, by our ministerial friend would probably not be very objectionable to the most pronounced Rationalist, but if he means the Christian and Hebrew "Jehovah"—the "Lord God" of Abraham, of Moses, of Joshua, of David and of "John the Revelator," then the advocate of civil liberty and equality would far more consistently and hopefully appeal to the "word" of Emperor William of Prussia, or of the Czar of Russia, and the advocate of religious liberty to the "word" of the most bigoted pope that ever filled the pontifical chair, than can any one appeal to the Christian's "Most High" for help in the work of breaking the yoke of man from off the neck of womanhood.

To show what the "God-idea" has done and is now doing to fasten the yoke of man upon the neck of woman, I would respectfully recommend Mrs. Cady Stanton's "Woman's Bible," and Mrs. Joslyn Gage's "Woman Church and State."

Then, as to what freedom from man's yoke really means for woman,—what "true humanhood in sex" means—I fear there is not such accord between the position of Rev. Mr. Jones and that of Lucifer as could be wished. The freedom attained by the woman whose body is now "His temple, not to be defiled," seems to some of us to be simply the freedom of the Catholic nun in the cloister, that is, the freedom of sex-starvation. Is this Brother Jones' idea of the freedom of womanhood? Is this his standard of purity and of virtue in sex-relationships? I do not think it is his idea, and if he will tell us, in few words, just what he means by the "true life of sex," and what he means by the "movement to establish an order of genuine humans on earth," he will confer a favor on sex-reformers, whether from the Christian or Rationalist standpoint. We cannot promise much space to any one contributor but discussions of the subjects treated upon by our Christian brother in this week's Lucifer are the most vitally important of all discussions relating to human welfare and human progress.

"What Shall I Say to My Child?"

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

This is one of the questions I am frequently called on to answer, and am asked what books are best to place in the hands of the young.

There are many mothers who fancy they have themselves left the Valleys of Superstition, who yet feel, in memory, the gray mist which enshrouded their own childhood, and who can not realize there is no necessity that their own children should pass their young lives in ignorance and shame.

To the first question I answer: "Tell the truth!" If you desire to preserve your child's confidence in you, let it understand that you are always perfectly frank with it. Children are as different in character from each other as are men and women, and that fact renders it difficult to recommend or write any book which would interest and instruct all children. But a mother can and should make a study of her own child, should understand its desires, tastes, and trend of thought. If she is herself ignorant on any point, she should say, frankly, "I do not know; but we will study together." The pleasure of feeling the mother to be a companion in the search for knowledge instead of merely a teacher, who knows it all in advance, has advantages which are obvious.

"It is not so much what you say as how you say it," is a trite statement. If a woman has been so unfortunate as to conceive a child "in shame," she should have outgrown that feeling by the time the child has arrived at the questioning age, and be able to tell of the processes of nature in the development of the embryo with as little sense of shame, and with as great an uplifting feeling of beauty as she might feel when explaining to the child that when the tiny pansy seed is dropped into the warm, moist earth the warmth and moisture cause the seed to swell and burst and put forth a slender stem from which the leaves unfold and grow, while the earth and water nourish and the sun warms, until one day the great purple pansy, which so strikingly resembles the round, innocent face of a child, bursts into full bloom. Never give the child the impression that there is anything in natural, healthy life of which to be ashamed. Nothing is "nasty" in itself. Teach the child by word and example that every part of its body is pure if kept clean; that there is use for every organ and function. If you warn it against certain practices, give a reason for it. Children can understand reasons if you try to make the reasons clear to to them. If your child puts its finger in its eye, do you exclaim, "Don't! Shame on you! That's nasty!" On the contrary, do you not explain that the eye is a delicate organ of sight, which may be seriously injured by such treatment?

A friend of mine, one of the most rational women I know, told me that her little boy aged eleven had one day asked her, "Mamma, what makes the babies grow? Can women make them come when they want to,—or how?" She had previously explained to him the mother principle, but not the father principle, and when this question came she could not answer, but evaded it as best she could. She is a superior woman, yet she could not shake off the old sense of shame and tell her son simply and candidly just how conception took place. By her evident dodging of the question she risked lowering herself in the estimation of that child, for it is probable that he had heard something of it from other boys, and her evasion would naturally lead him to think that she felt ashamed of the act which called him into existence, and she missed an opportunity of impressing on his mind the sacredness of love. She could have told him, as I know she feels, that only in love can such a relation be enjoyed at its highest, and have given him helpful thoughts that would have aided him in maintaining respect for his mother, for himself, and for the girls and women of his acquaintance.

Do you like to do certain things, or abstain from doing other things, merely because of an arbitrary "Thou shalt" or "Thou shalt not"? Of course you want to know the reason. Then why should you desire your child to act blindly without reason? Would you send your child on a journey through the wilderness at night, telling him only of imaginary hobgoblins which might snatch him if he did not close his eyes and pray to Great Jove and Great Grundy at every step? Would you not rather tell him of the real rocks and ditches, brambles and hills in his pathway, and give him a light whereby he could see and avoid them?

Book Notes.

"Value and an Invariable Unit of Value," is the title of a book of 132 pages written by William A. Whittick, who is well known as a writer on economics and also as a writer of poems of freedom. Mr. Whittick claims to have made the important economic discovery of an invariable unit of value, which economists have long believed to be an impossible thing. He criticises the definitions of value given by many economists, and points out what he considers their errors. In his preface he says:

"The savants tell us that our problem is unsolvable—that an invariable standard of value is unattainable—yea, inconceivable—that it is the 'squaring of the circle' for economists; but we brush the savants aside and we give political economy a determination of its 'fundamental idea' value, and a standard measure and unit of value, invariable for all time, perfect in its functions and attributes. A science of political economy is now possible."

The book is written in a spirit of apparent fairness and good temper, and the arguments it presents will doubtless interest many friends of the present gold-standard currency as well as the champions of bimetallism. For sale at Lucifer office. Price, paper cover, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

Prof. Joseph Rodes Buchanan's latest publication is a handsome little book of 133 pages whose import is pretty fully set forth in the title, a part of which is ("A Scientific Secret Revealed.) Periodicity, the absolute law of the entire universe long known to control all matter, now revealed as the law of all Life." Prof. Buchanan is well known as a writer on scientific and metaphysical subjects. The theory he advances in this little book is elaborated in his usual emphatic and oracular manner. Price, 50 cents.

Memorial Tribute to Prof. E. D. Cope.

We, the undersigned societies, fairly representing, we believe the freethinkers of Philadelphia, recognizing in the death of Prof. Edward Cope a profound and irreparable loss to our movement, inasmuch as he was undoubtedly one of the foremost and ablest opponents of those religious superstitions which it is our aim to eradicate, do hereby render tribute to his memory.

A most indefatigable worker in the fields of those experimental sciences upon which the burden of the proofs of evolution rests, a prolific and lucid writer upon such subjects, having contributed many valuable books to contemporaneous scientific literature, a patient and conscientious educator, having as such an incalculable influence upon our youth in laying the foundations of a superstructure of ethical life without the props of superstition, a most courteous and kindly gentleman, with no empty pride of knowledge, but ready to give freely of his learning whenever time permitted as evinced by the many lectures delivered before our societies with no other compensation than the consciousness of pleasing and instructing,—lectures beneficial both by their intrinsic worth and by the additional influence of his personality, we are compelled to declare that,

"He was a man,—take him for all in all,
We shall not look upon his like again."

The Academy and the University have mourned him as investigator and educator; we, in addition, mourn him as liberator.

This declaration of our rights shall be forwarded to the various liberal journals.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Long ere this the assurance had been Imelda's that Edith and Hilda were both true sisters of their brother Wilbur, and that they espoused sex reform in its highest sense, and when an hour later these two bright girls joined the Ellwood sisters Cora was again surprised to hear the same sentiments voiced in equally strong language. Hilda knelt beside the dumbfounded Cora, and while playfully fondling her hand told her of plans that had been maturing in that youthful head.

"Sometime," she said, "when we shall have more money at our command than now, we will build ourselves a home. O, such a glorious, beautiful home, in some retired or isolated spot, and our lovers shall come and share it. But only just so long as they are our lovers, for we want no masters. We shall be strong enough, and capable of standing at the head of our home ourselves, and directing its management. Don't you think so? Our home shall be our kingdom, and we shall reign queens therein, and our lovers will be our dear friends and comrades, instead of husbands. Will not that be glorious?"

With an experience such as hers had been it was not much to be wondered at that Cora became an apt pupil of this, to her, new doctrine, and of which this trio of girls were such enthusiastic advocates. Edith and Imelda smiled as they listened to the glowing description of Hilda's home while a new and wonderful light began to glow in the hazel eyes of the bewildered Cora, and then she began to question, and all the time one utterance of Hilda's kept ringing in her ears: "When we shall have more money." When? But first she wanted to know and understand, and for a while she kept the trio busy answering her questions. She had become deeply interested and now wanted fully to understand.

"How many are there in this scheme? How many such daring members are there?"

"Well," answered Hilda, "there are four of us here; for of course you are in it. Then that wonderful brother of ours is the lover of a sweet girl in that western home of yours. Margaret Leland is her name."

"Margaret Leland!" interrupted Cora, and looked inquiringly at Imelda. "Was there not——"

"The same," said Imelda. "She was employed at the same store where we used to work, and for years has been my best friend. It is to her largely that I am indebted for my present views. But now please let Hilda proceed."

"Well," continued Hilda, "Margaret's mother comes next. From all accounts we could not well get along without her and——well, I don't know. Is there anyone else?"—looking inquiringly at the girls.

"I think," answered Imelda, "it will be perfectly safe to count Mrs. Westcot in——'Alice Day,' Cora, I was speaking of her before. That makes seven, I believe, and who knows, by the time 'our home' is built there may be as many more."

"And how many lovers are there?" asked Cora. This caused a little laugh.

"One I know, and two I believe," was Imelda's answer to Cora's question. "Wilbur Wallace, the brother of these dear girls, we can be sure of, and Norman Carlton I hope may soon be able to see clear enough to be willing that woman should in all things be able to decide for herself."

"Who is Norman Carlton?"

A beautiful rosy color swept over Imelda's sweet face, and Cora was answered. "O," she said with a slight gasping sound, "now I know how you understood so well." Then Hilda spoke:

"I have been waiting for Edith to make some kind of announcement, but she sings 'mum.'"

"Hilda!"

"Edith! I am not afraid, sister mine. You know you met a very interesting gentleman last year in our rambles on the mountains."

"Yes! but child, you also know that we have not seen him since, and as we had just received a call to come home immediately we left without a word of farewell;—then again we did not get a deep enough insight into the views of Paul Arthur to enable us to ascertain whether or not he is a Free Lover."

"O, but I have heard him express himself very clearly at one time on the subject of marriage. 'It is the grave of love,' he said, 'the altar upon which the holiest emotions are sacrificed.'"

"It may all be true," Edith replied, "but, as I remarked before, we may never see or hear from him again."

"But," Hilda said, kissing Cora's pale cheek, "have you no contribution to make in the shape of a lover?" Slowly the rich color swept over the pale face; involuntarily her eye sought Imelda's. Was there a meaning in the glance? She smiled.

"Can you see the rising sun?" Imelda asked, but for answer the pearly drops filled the sad eyes. "O, if I dared hope." To the inquiring looks of the sisters Imelda replied:

"When Cora is stronger I am sure she will tell you her story in all its details, as you have proved yourself so trustworthy. A cloud at present overcasts the heaven of her love; but don't clouds always in the course of nature move on, and are not the heavens always so much clearer and more beautiful after their removal? So hope, little sister. I expect ere long to look into the sunny laughing eyes of your Owen. The world is large but not so large but that the divine magnet of love will attract and direct each one to his or her affinity."

Thus bringing hope and cheer to the weary aching heart of the girl the days, one by one, passed by.

Several weeks more had now passed away. Cora had gained rapidly in strength, and as Mr. and Mrs. Wallace were now daily expected to return home and the girls wishing to avoid an explanation it was thought best to remove the patient to the abode of the Westcots. Alice was also anxious to have Imelda return as she was fast losing all control of her little daughters. Tender, loving mother that she was she was totally unfit to train her little ones. Besides she was not yet as strong as she might be.

With an unwilling heart Cora had bade good bye to the sisters who had shown her so much kindness and love. Imelda's eyes, too, had filled with tears as she kissed both gentle girls, but she carried with her the promise that she should soon see both at "Maple Lawn." Cora's cheeks were tinged with a faint peach-bloom color denoting the return of health, and her eyes sparkled as she and Imelda were swiftly driven along towards the outskirts of the city where the Westcot mansion was situated amid its beautiful gardens. Just as the setting sun was casting the last golden rays across their path the carriage drove up the beautiful maple-drive to where little Alice, in daintiest of white gowns, was awaiting them, her eyes sparkling with joy at the prospect of having Imelda once more with her. The little girls also, arrayed in their pretty white dresses, were watching for their "Miss Meldy." They clapped their little hands and fairly danced with delight when the figure of their young teacher alighted. They grew somewhat quieter when a second lady, so pale and languid, stepped from the carriage and slowly followed the more quick moving Imelda. She caught the little ones in her arms and they clung to her as if they would never again let go of their beloved friend. Alice, finding herself overlooked in this meeting, turned to Cora. Holding out both hands in welcome she soon made the sad-eyed girl feel that her words were no formal phrase, but that they came from a warm impulsive heart.

"I hope not to be a burden long," said Cora. "I am beginning to feel quite strong now, and in a short time hope to be able to look about for some work to do."

Alice laid her hand upon her lips.

"Not one word more. A burden indeed! On the contrary I feel as though I had a great deal to make good. This, (touching with her dainty finger the red mark which was just peeping from beneath the mass of ringlets that covered the young girl's forehead) this will be a constant reminder of what might have proved a fatal accident, and as yet I have had no opportunity to right the wrong that has been done." Cora protested but Alice had her way, as that little woman invariably did have. She herself conducted her up the wide staircase to the room which had been set apart for her and which adjoined Imelda's.

"I thought you two might want to be near each other," she explained. "But now let me help you dress for dinner. I will be your dressing maid. How long do you expect still to nurse your arm? It must be tiresome to have it so tightly bandaged."

Cora smiled.

"O yes," she said. "It will be quite pleasant when I shall be able to move about with more freedom again. I will not then feel so much as if I were a constant task on some one's hands, so almost perfectly useless."

"Please don't!" In a pleading manner the little woman spoke the words. "Can I not make you understand that you are not a task and burden? Had it not been for that almost fatal drive those long weary weeks of pain would have been spared you——"

"And in all probability I should have missed meeting the best of friends,—would have failed to find my one, my only sister. No! no! the little pain that I have endured does not so much matter, and if you can all have patience with me until my strength returns and I am once more myself I am sure I have every reason not to complain, for the good the last few weeks have brought me far outweighs everything they may have contained of unpleasantness."

VARIOUS VOICES.

A. H. Frank, Buffalo, N. Y.:—Last Lucifer [No, 653] is worth the price of a year's subscription.

E. B. Foote, Jr., New York:—Here's an Easter offering of ten dollars, less the cost of half a dozen April "Our New Humanity" which I will hope to have when out.

Henry C. Roberts, Bennington, Kan.:—We were much incensed—and deeply regret the treatment you received at the hands of H. L. Green, editor of the so-called "Free Thought Magazine. We feel that in his assaults upon the cause which you so ably represent, he strikes a blow at the very foundations upon which Liberty rests. Enclosed find one dollar to apply on Lucifer and twenty cents for two copies of "What the Young Should Know."

J. Wright, Guelph, Ont.:—Please send a dollar's worth of back numbers, and I will send another dollar for the current year. I don't care whether the back numbers are consecutive or not, so long as they are not duplicates. Every number is valuable, no matter how old. Will be glad to see the numbers that tell about the imprisonment. I had lost track of Lucifer.

[We send files of back numbers at fifty cents a year—or one cent per copy, to all regular subscribers to Lucifer, as long as the supply of back numbers lasts. Hope our Canadian friend will not lose track of us again. M. H.]

Mrs. M. L. Porter, Lincoln, Neb.:—What I will term a fortunate circumstance threw two copies of "Our New Humanity" in my way—one containing "The Prodigal Daughter." I have read many things but never anything that fills the bill so entirely as they do. Enclosed find twenty-five cents for a later copy of "Our New Humanity." I would be glad to place the number that treats of "The Prodigal Daughter" in the hands of all mothers who could be persuaded to read it, but all women are not interested as they should be in this most important of all subjects, and many who are held by the church would repudiate the whole thing.

L. W., San Francisco, Calif.:—Brother Moses: The following is copied from a letter just received; the money was enclosed. This is the second time he has thus done missionary work. An excellent example for other smokers to follow: "I have never considered myself a heavy smoker; late years I have evoluted out of it. Every Sunday I put twenty cents in a tin box under the stove. That is what the weed cost me, and when I get three dollars I send it to you for books. Please send the books named to Mrs. ——."

[The writer of the above note to me is Lois Waisbrooker, whose present address is 1425 Howard street, San Francisco. As indicated Mrs. Waisbrooker is handling her own books. Her friends who wish to order from her can do so at the address named. M. H.]

Jonathan Mayo Crane, Chicago:—"The Functions of Government," in No. 656, furnished the provocation for the following lines:

My pen to take I hesitate
To write the thoughts that agitate
My mind when I do contemplate
L. Berrier's use of "innovate."
Just what he meant I cannot state.
Unless it was to adumbrate
The point he sought to illustrate;
To cause us all to cogitate
And meditate and lucubrate,
And do our best to explicate
The vague suggestion inchoate.
Now if he will elucidate
That word it will accommodate
His readers in the aggregate,
And help them to appreciate
His way to ratiocinate.
I wait sedate. I hate debate;
So let him tell me fair and straight
Just what he meant. Say'st, Berrier, say'st

LOVE, MARRIAGE, AND DIVORCE

And the Sovereignty of the Individual.

A Discussion between Henry James, Horace Greely, and Stephen Pearl Andrews. There are here included the final replies of Mr. Andrews, refused by the New York Tribune, and a subsequent discussion, occurring twenty years later, between Mr. James and Mr. Andrews.

"The great lesson for the world to learn is that HUMAN BEINGS DO NOT NEED TO BE TAKEN CARE OF. What they do need is such conditions of justice and freedom as if friendly co operation that they can take care of themselves. Provided for by another, and subject to his will as the return tribute, they pine, and sicken, and die. This is true equally of women as of men: as true of wives as it is of vassals or serfs. Our whole existing marital system is the house of bondage and the slaughter-house of the female sex. Whether its evils are inherent or incidental, whether they belong to the essence or the administration of the institution whether they are remediable without or only by means of revolution, are the questions that now have to be discussed."

THE UNREVEALED RELIGION.

An address of great depth, strength, and beauty. By the veteran, J. K. Ingalls.

"The rainbow is not less beautiful and wonderful to me than to Noah, or to the aborigines, because I understand something of optics and the refraction of light. The Good of Truth, whether we worship it as an entity or as a personality, or conceive of it as impersonal, is an ever-living and persistent principle man can never cease to revere and admire. And his growth in knowledge and progress in all things refining and elevating to his nature will be promoted, not retarded, by the true but unrevealed, and as yet "unloved religion, 'The Religion of Progress'."

Superfluous Devices.

Who but a man bereft of sense would think
To prop the sky, and thus prevent its fall?
Or stop Niagara at its very brink
By the creation of a mud-built wall?
Or stretch a chain across the boisterous sea,
To force it into slumberous repose?
Or regulate the law of gravity,
Lest chaos came all order to foreclose?
And who but one demented will contend
That truth, unaided by external force,
Successfully her cause cannot defend,
But must to carnal weapons have recourse?
That in religion, reason is no guide?
That Liberty to License is allied?

Popular Follies and Crimes.

BY JAMES S. DENSON.

A few weeks ago the moralists in a section of the oil fields of West Virginia did some very effective proselyting. They set fire to a "disorderly" house and burned two girls to death, and to a "speak-easy" and cremated two men. It is almost as fearful a thing to fall into the hands of really good people as into the clutches of Yahveh. By the way, why do Christians never "return good for evil," and why do they generally give more evil than they have received? Persistently disobeying every precept of their "master," how can they have the effrontery to call themselves "Christ-ians"?

How fragile is the partition between morality and immorality! A number of the Methodist ministers of Camden appeared before the New Jersey legislature and lobbied against the proposed law requiring the taking out of licenses by those intending to marry. The ministers said that many poor people would prefer to live together without being married to going to the county seat and paying for a license. It seems to me that the marriage moralists of the past have not made a very deep impression in the brain and conscience of mankind if many Christians are willing to let fifty cents or one dollar stand between each of them and an "honest marriage" and the "heaven" which is promised to the "good" as their future home.

"The penalty of sin—brother and seducer kill each other and the girl goes mad." This is the heading of the newspaper report of a Florida occurrence. There is nothing to show that the girl was an unwilling participant in the "seduction." So the girl was an unwilling participant in the "seduction," not the "sin" is in the ill-regulated imagination of the reporter, not in the love relation itself. There is one feature of this tragedy that somewhat relieves its horror—the murderous brother was killed; he does not survive to be pointed at by admiring fools as a hero of assassination. If it could only be certain that the invader would always fall with his victim invasion would soon be reduced to a minimum. It is not future punishment, in this world or some dreamed-of one, that acts as a deterrent to crime, but the certainty that the act of invasion is suicidal.

Rev. E. J. Oldknow Millington, of Newark, N. J., has been very active in that town in the attempt to suppress liquor selling, regulate art, and supervise the newspaper press. A few weeks ago he left his family and eloped to Montreal with a Mrs. Dickerson. After they had been in the Canadian city for some time it became known that they were together and they returned to Newark. They separately met committees of the Fairmount Baptist Church, of which he was the pastor and she a prominent member, went through the repentance act, bewailed their "sin," and were dropped from the rolls of the church. It is perhaps not strange that a chronic meddler, who could not keep his nose out of the business of other people, should meekly put himself into position to receive the contemptuous kicks of his intrusive parishioners. Utter lack of dignity is the most salient characteristic of the hypocritical moralist.

A Glimpse of the Old Order.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

At last the time has come when we who have protested against enforced motherhood must give up the fight and cheerfully admit that there can be none but willing mothers. The impossibility of the existence of any other kind has been demonstrated by a Chicago reporter. This veracious youth has discovered a woman, the mother of fourteen children, whose highest ambition is to bear seven more children that she may equal the record of her husband's first wife, and make him the "happy" father of forty-two children.

This interesting family was brought to the notice of the reporter and the public by the advent, on April 27, of the father's thirty-fifth child. The parents are Russian Jews. The man and his first wife were married when each was twenty years of age. The first child was born in 1852, and a child each succeeding year, with one exception, until 1873. Then his wife, having performed her "duty to society," died, and, it is to be hoped, found rest in the place where there is "neither marrying nor giving in marriage."

"Isaac mourned for her four years," we are informed by the reporter, "and then he married Sarah Gluck." They came to Chicago six years ago. One of the children was born on shipboard—there was no time to be lost in their task of populating the earth. Isaac is a tinsmith; "the workshop occupies the front part of the basement, which also serves for a dining room and kitchen. Two, small, dingy, untidy rooms in the rear furnish the rapidly growing family with sleeping apartments." The work the father of this family does "furnishes a meager support, for he earns only an average of thirty cents a day."

The mother of this family is very anxious to bear seven more children, as I have previously stated. She said so to her husband, her husband told the interpreter, the interpreter informed the reporter, the reporter gave the statement to the world through the daily paper, which I read and now pass on to the reader of these lines. Therefore the desire of her heart cannot be more clear to the eye of omniscience itself than to this reader.

As a student of social problems I felt great interest in this story, and a desire to see the quality of offspring which such conditions produce. And farther than that, I have a warm place in my heart for all little babies. My desire to see that rara avis, a woman anxious to endure cold, hunger, the sufferings of gestation and parturition, and willing that innocent little lives should share such hardships, that she might bring as great a number of children as possible into the world, made me resolve to visit her. And my instinctive feeling for the poor little one, thus unpropitiously ushered into existence, caused me to think of little garments made before the birth of my own child, worn by her, and now lying unused, yellowing with years. I have given away some of them, but there are certain unreasoning sentiments which are difficult to outgrow. But I knew that, no matter how much a woman may desire to increase the number of her husband's children, clothing for them cannot be provided in superabundance on an income of thirty cents a day.

Fancy a smoky, murky, dirty street, with electric cars flashing between struggling teams, and with many people on the sidewalks even on a stormy Sunday afternoon. Go with me down a narrow stairway, past two small windows the tops of which are on a level with the sidewalk. The door is opened by a little boy, disclosing to view a small, dark room. An old man sits at a table reading a Hebrew Bible. The reporter described him as "a small man with a grizzled, unkempt beard and straggling locks of hair that fall from a small, greasy skull cap. Whether sleeping or waking he never takes off the cap." A little fellow rolls marbles on the floor, but my interest is centered on the tiny bundle held by a little girl over in the corner by the stove. I tell the girl the object of my visit,—that I want to see the baby, and having had experience know that such new arrivals need plenty of clothes and take the opportunity of placing some of mine where they will do some good. Then the mother enters. She is low in stature. Her face is deathly white, with downward lines from corners of eyes and mouth, but it lights up with a pleasant smile. She looks as though she might be intelligent if she had any opportunity for development. The conversation is necessarily limited to the children and myself, except such remarks as the little girl interprets.

But the baby! Such a tiny, morsel of humanity I never before held in my arms. It seemed of no weight at all, and the skin lay in innumerable wrinkles on the bones of its fragile fingers. It seemed that it would be utterly lost in a dress which was rather small for my child when new-born. But I could not keep my eyes from the face—so thin, that it gave the eyes an unusually large, preternaturally solemn appearance. It stared unseeingly on me, and the cold, which partly obstructed eyes and nose, gave it an expression of pain which made my heart ache.

"The baby will have pretty eyes," I remarked to the girl.

"But it cries so—it don't sleep at night, much, and not in the day unless some one holds it. We haven't any buggy or cradle for it. I hold it on Sundays."

"And on other days——?"

"O, then it must cry."

"Do you go to school?" I asked.

"No; I have not time."

She is fourteen; but in size she does not appear eleven.

"Your mamma looks well, considering her illness, and is up soon."

There is the flash of an indescribable smile as with a slight shrug she responds:

"O, yes,—but she's got to!"

The mother, it seems, did not transmit her reputed intense desire for babies to all her children. A little boy of three years awoke and cried. I tried to make friends with him, telling him of my little girl.

"She loves babies so dearly," I said. "She would be glad to see these."

"He don't like them," replied little Hannah. "He strikes at the baby, and comes around and pokes his fingers in its eyes."

The father of this interesting family is very proud of the number and hopes to increase it to at least forty. The fact that twenty-two are already dead does not in the least discourage him. He smokes his pipe, reads his Bible, and undoubtedly thinks that "The Lord hath taken away."

It must not be forgotten that this child-torture, this child-murder, is both legal and respectable. If any one, however, had told the mother how to prevent the conception of this frail specimen of humanity such information would have been held to be illegal and the one who imparted it would have risked imprisonment. Yet I wonder how many of our law-makers and law-worshipers there are who would be willing to enter life under similar circumstances.

When I came away it was with a heart-sick feeling of helplessness and hopelessness. The room, the people, are photographed in my memory, but more indelibly than any is the face of that tiny baby with its great eyes in which I fancied I could read the question,—WHY? The face followed me, and would not be banished. It fixed itself between me and the speakers at the meeting to which I next went. And that evening, at the home of friends, that little face was with me, and the music and pleasant conversation could not banish it from my mind.

The story of "The Prisoner of Chillon" has caused many tears to flow. But, as a matter of fact, he had only six years of imprisonment to endure, and he was not bringing others into the world to live again his misery.

But, in fancy, just transpose Bonnivard from the sixteenth century to the end of the nineteenth. Bring him from the Castle of Chillon overlooking one of the most beautiful lakes of the world, to a three-celled dungeon under the ground near the Chicago river. Then have him condemned by a special dispensation of Providence to bring a little Bonnivard into existence every year, at the peril of his own life, and add to that the maternal instinct which feels intensified every pain which the child may suffer.

There would then be no tears shed over the fate of Bonnivard. Reporters, in the fullness of their sympathetic hearts, would sketch his "happy family," and press and pulpit would unite in lauding the institutions established and maintained for his protection.

As Some Others See Us.

BY E. C. WALKER.

The opponents of social radicalism are just now helping me to view life on its humorous side. As part of my propagandistic work, I am writing a good many letters to persons who have in some way become imbued with the delusion that they are Freethinkers. As one of the consequences, I am receiving communications that alternately warm the cockles of my heart and send cold shivers chasing one another down my spine. I laugh at the ridiculous spectacles these men are making of themselves, and I am chilled when I remember that they suppose themselves to represent the "advanced thought" of the age, and that their ballots possess the power wielded by those of the same number of clear thinkers and all-around humanitarians. Here is the first sample:

If every person who marries would act as kind to each other all the rest of there existence as they did previous to there marriage The pernicious doctrine of Free Love Would never have been thought of.

That construction is simply awful, but I have managed to rescue from the tangle of words the thought that if men and women never married they would be kind to each other, for it is perfectly plain that persons tied together will irritate and annoy each other, that it is absolutely impossible for them to be as considerate and gentle when bound as when free. Let my correspondent try the experiment with two children that have always been the most friendly of playmates; let him tie them together and see how long it will be before they are quarreling and pulling hair. Let him try the experiment with the household cat and dog or with two hitherto peaceable cats. Liberty conduces to harmony; restraint stirs up strife and banishes order. Legal, monogamic, indissoluble marriage is, inherently and always, the enemy of respect, tenderness and self-hood.

Says another gentleman:

There is much need of education on matters you mention, but of a kind that don't take men from their wives and children and send them triangling over the world hunting after damned affinities and winding up with 84. Botolph Street tragedies.

The conclusion is a non sequitur. If the death together of an unmarried man and an unmarried woman by the accidental inhaling of illuminating gas is to be charged to the account of social freedom, must we not charge to the account of legal marriage the overcoming of two married couples by gas in the same week that witnessed the death of Mr. Putnam and Miss Collins? The gentleman's logic is enough to make Whately turn in his grave. Should he say that had our friends not been together they would not have died together, I retort that had the husbands and wives mentioned not been together they would not have died together. My assertion is as good as his; both are truisms, and neither has any bearing on the questions at issue between the social radical and the champion of compulsory marriage.

Last but not least comes a far Western scholar with this:

I don't wish to be come A member of anes Free Love outfit I have had two papers of Lucifer sent to me and I do not want aney more and I dont want aney Free Love Books in my way of thinking A man or woman to believe in Free Love they most have A head on their sholders like A road Lizzerd

Only that and nothing more! My friend is not sufficiently clear in his statements. While he says with perfect distinctness that he does not want any free love books of his own way of thinking, he does not specify whether free love books of my way of thinking would be or would not be acceptable. Possibly he can be suited yet in this line of literature, for if his library of free love books is composed of tomes in his own way of thinking and if his way of thinking is as confused as his way of expressing his thoughts, he will be agreeably surprised when he examines free love books of the free lovers' way of thinking—and writing. In all seriousness, no man who is so poorly equipped for investigation can expect to understand the doctrines of social radicalism. Our friend's reference to "a man or a woman with a head on their sholders like a road Lizzard," reminds me of a pleasant story of one of the erstwhile prominent Liberal lecturers. The gentleman has long been famous for his gallant championship of the cause so ably espoused by my jester with the president's English. A good many years ago he engaged in a debate with a Christian minister in a small Iowa village. Of course a great many Christians came out to hear their side defended against the assaults of the Infidel. It should be said here, as a statement of fact, that our representative is the possessor of a neck that would be no discredit to a middle-aged and generously nourished Catholic priest. A Christian woman who heard the discussion was asked her opinion of the disputants. Of course she had only words of praise for the minister, but when it came to the Infidel she was not slow to say that, looking upon that neck with the eye of the alert student of character, she believed that its owner would display remarkable earnestness and agility in passing from the ground to a point of observation in the top of a tall tree, provided that a comely woman had preceded him in that direction. Now, I am free to admit, it is not impossible that the Christian lady's remark was inspired by religious prejudice; nevertheless, it is a coincidence worth noting that the Infidel itinerant thus summarily judged is at present camping with virtuous vindictiveness on the trail of the dead and therefore non-resisting Samuel P. Putnam.

Protection against the tyranny of the magistrate is not enough; there needs to be protection also against the tyranny of prevailing opinion and feeling.—John Stuart Mill.

Currency and Freedom.

BY W. P. BORLAND.

The antiquarian who is contributing a series of alleged "sociologic lessons" to the very interesting columns of Lucifer came nearer to the truth than he has generally been able to get during his very protracted, but entirely harmless, excursions into the realm of sociology, when he declared that prices do not depend on the volume of currency; and I fear the editor of Lucifer is a trifle hasty in asserting that it is "a self-evident proposition that prices do depend mainly upon the volume of currency in circulation."

I would like to have this "self-evident" proposition applied to the case of kerosene oil, for instance; to sugar, or to anthracite coal. State if doubling the present volume of money would double the prices of these commodities,—and why? Suppose the present volume of money were reduced one-half, would it inevitably follow that the price of oil would be cut squarely in two? And what is to prevent the Standard Oil Company from charging 50 cents a gallon for oil now instead of the price it does charge? Is it the volume of money in circulation, or is it something else?

There are a great many of these "self-evident" propositions in economics and sociology which have assumed the character of truth merely through force of continued iteration. The believers in true freedom ought not to be deceived concerning the true nature of the propositions; neither ought they to have much difficulty in estimating at its true worth the insipid rehash of ancient economic superstitions which is being presented to them in the columns of Lucifer under the name of "sociologic lessons."

However, the author of these curious "lessons" is right when he declares the prevalent volume theory of money, as taught by Ricardo, Mill, and their long line of illustrous imitators in economic science, a fallacy; but he kicks his fat all in the fire again when he returns to the market value of gold as the regulator of prices. That is merely a restatement of the fallacious volume theory in another form,—the wise author of these alleged "sociologic lessons" ought to be able to see that.

I am a believer in unlimited freedom. I utterly repudiate all government, all artificial, man-made laws. I say, with Burke, "In vain you tell me that artificial government is good, and that I fall out only with the abuse. The thing; the thing itself is the abuse!" When I reason on social and economic problems, I try to do so from this standpoint, and in the light of true freedom, as far as I am able. I believe the editor of Lucifer, so far as government and the necessity for full freedom is concerned, holds views similar to my own, if not identical.

Then let him divest his mind of preconceived opinions; let him forget all about the so-called "laws of trade" and all other of the fundamental propositions of the bastard science, misnamed "Political Economy,"—because they all imply both government and private property—and let him take a short mental excursion into the realm of true freedom. When he has done this, I am convinced that he will be able to recognize and classify some facts concerning price which will knock many of his present "self-evident" propositions into a cocked hat.

Sociologic Lesson. No. XXXIX.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

DEMAND AND SUPPLY. The law that demand and supply are connected underlies all commercial transactions. No legislation can affect it permanently. If people desire an article which is scarce, the demand being greater than the supply, the price necessarily advances. Any law to the contrary will be evaded. The holders can not be compelled to sell if they do not wish to, and they will not wish to sell unless they can get the increased amount which the scarcity of the article warrants. On the other hand no one can be compelled by law to buy an article he does not want; and the only way articles of which the supply is superabundant can be sold is by a reduction of the price.

This law effectually supplants the principle that has been proposed, "Cost the limit of price;" for if an article has cost more than the market price it can not be sold for its cost; and if it has cost less than the market price the owner will not be willing to lose the difference.

Volume of Currency—Trusts, etc.

Thanking W. P. Borland for his frank and sharp but not unkindly criticism, so far as it refers to myself, and looking over the article criticised I see evidence that it was "hastily" written. The word "currency" should have been defined, since it is used so frequently in more senses than one. Webster's definition, in part, is,

"That which is in circulation, or is given or taken as having value, or as representing property."

Used in this sense currency may include the "Labor Check," issued by the organizations called "Labor Exchange," which certainly does not take the gold dollar as its "basis."

Yes, it is doubtless true that monopolies and trusts, such as Standard Oil, Sugar Trust and Coal Combines, do control prices to an extent unheard-of in Ante-bellum days. I should perhaps have said, "leaving out of the problem the baleful influence of modern trusts and combines the volume of currency is the chief factor in determining prices of commodities, or products of labor."

It will doubtless be objected that this is yielding the whole field, since it is easily shown that we have always had with us the great parent trust, the combine of combines, the giant octopus or devil-fish trust, from whose slimy tentacles there is no escaping, viz., the "government" itself!

While this objection voices a tremendous truth it is also true that, in the memory of many of Lucifer's readers, there was a time when this most iniquitous and most powerful of all the trusts that now rob the people—the government itself,—was a very different thing from what it is today. During the years from 1830, we may say, to 1860, the power for evil exercised by governments, state and national, was as a mole hill to a mountain compared to what it now is.

During the great war waged for the inauguration of the reign of plutocracy,—commonly but falsely called the war for the abolition of "slavery"—the powers of government in this country were enormously increased, and with this increase of power came, naturally enough, the abuses of that power. Prominent among these abuses is the formation, the birth and the rapid growth of a vast brood of corporation trusts and combines, children that exercise power for evil second only to that of the parent trust from which they derive their existence. During the decades referred to there was comparatively speaking no monopoly of coal—of oil, of sugar,—and almost no monopoly of machinery or of transportation. And it is of this period I was probably thinking when the paragraph about the currency was written, in my brief reply to the "Sociologic Lesson."

Referring to the reply of H. M. Parkhurst entitled "Restricted Currency," I have room only to say that the principle enunciated in the last line of his brief reply seems to cover the ground. "All the restriction is to protect, first from fraud, and second from robbery."

If this is all the restriction needed then we can have, or should have, free issue and free trade in currency—as in all commodities. Free trade in currency would mean no privileged class of currency. This would abolish "legal tender" as a government monopoly or privilege.

Protecting from "fraud and robbery" would protect against such gigantic frauds and robberies as was perpetrated upon the debt-paying people when their debt was changed from one of "Greenbacks" to one of gold. If it were possible to right any wrong by punishment, what would be the measure of punishment that would fit the perpetrators of this crime of the ages?

The Case of Joseph R. Dunlop.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

Joseph R. Dunlop, editor and publisher of the Chicago "Dispatch," was taken to the Joliet penitentiary Tuesday of last week to serve a term of two years imprisonment. This penalty, together with a fine of $2,000, was imposed upon him for the crime of using the United States mail for the purpose of circulating literature which a jury in the federal court held to be obscene. The literature said to be obscene consisted of different advertisements which were repeatedly published in his newspaper.

As a personal acquaintance and former employe of Mr. Dunlop, I will, at the request of the editor of Lucifer, give a brief and as nearly as possible unbiased account of his record during my acquaintance with him, and my view of his prosecution, conviction and imprisonment.

I first met Mr. Dunlop about nine years ago when he was appointed city editor of the Chicago "Times." This was at the time of the reorganization of that paper, a few years after the death of its owner, Wilbur F. Storey. Subsequently, about six years ago, I became an employe of the Chicago "Times" of which Mr. Dunlop was then managing editor. During two years association with Mr. Dunlop I found him to be very considerate of his subordinates and very devoted to his own duties as the director of the newspaper. While the "Times" was under his control he was so careful of the "tone" of the paper that the use in its columns of such words as "rape," "seduction," "abortion" and even "criminal assault" were absolutely forbidden. News items, the interest of which was due to illicit sexual asssociation, were rejected, except in very rare instances where the nature of the facts or the prominence of the persons involved seemed absolutely to demand publication.

After the purchase of the "Times" by the late Carter H. Harrison, father of Chicago's present mayor, Mr. Dunlop became publisher of the Chicago "Mail." He made the paper lively and sensational but did not permit the use of any words in its columns which, to use a conventional phrase, would offend the most fastidious.

About four years ago he started the Chicago "Dispatch" and his policy of puritan exclusiveness in the use of words suddenly changed. From the very start the paper was startling in its sensationalism. Its columns teemed with items of the kind usually found in such papers as the "Police Gazette." Stories of seduction, rape, adultery and so-called crimes against nature were printed with bold and striking headlines. It is true the paper, while publishing these stories, never failed to stigmatise and condemn the actors in these infractions of the code of conventional morality.

The sensational nature of the paper soon gained for it a large sale in the streets. It is also true that the "Dispatch" did a good work by its fearless exposure of frauds and swindles and was the means of forcing the restitution of considerable money to the defrauded victims. The sensational nature of the paper naturally attracted a class of advertisements which were excluded by the other Chicago dailies. This does not refer to the advertisements of "baths," "massage," or medicines for sexual disorders, for many of the other newspapers published such advertisements. The advertisements which were peculiar to the "Dispatch" were generally of a personal nature and were under the classified headings of "Personals," "Furnished Rooms" and "Situations Wanted." I have not a file of the paper at hand to give copies of actual advertisements, but from memory I submit a few written in the same style as many of those which were published in the "Dispatch."

PERSONAL.—A young lady (18) typewriter, employed during the day, would receive a few gentlemen callers in the evening from 7 to 10 o'clock. —— State street.

FURNISHED ROOMS.—A widow living alone has a few handsomely furnished rooms to rent for occasional use. Ladies introduced.

PERSONAL.—The little French lady has opened magnificent bath parlors at — W. Madison street. Special attention paid to idiosyncrasies

Many of the actual advertisements were even more suggestive than the samples given above. It was impossible for a man or woman of ordinary intelligence to mistake their thinly veiled meaning. And these advertisements were the basis of the indictment of Mr. Dunlop.

Now as to the defense set up by Mr. Dunlop's friends. The contention that he did not know these advertisements were in the paper is obviously untrue and if it were true it is irrelevant. It was his business to know it. It is also obviously untrue that he did not know the meaning of these advertisements. While no obscene word was used it is clear that the whole tone of many of these advertisements clearly brought them in the scope of the term "obscenity" as generally understood and as almost invariably construed by the courts. In my opinion then Mr. Dunlop was technically "guilty as charged in the indictment," and his conviction was in accordance with the evidence.

In extenuation Mr. Dunlop pleads that the publication of these advertisements did good by calling attention to the evils which the community permitted to exist without even attempting to suppress. This plea, if advanced as justification for his conduct, refutes the claims that he did not know the advertisements were in the paper and did not know their meaning. And even admitting it to be true, it would only be another proof of the fact that it is sometimes a penitentiary offense to do good. For instance the great majority of men and women in this country believe the knowledge of harmless methods of prevention of conception is a good thing and yet it is a penitentiary offense to even inform, or offer to inform, any person how conception can be prevented. So Mr. Dunlop's plea, even if true, does not disprove his technical guilt, but merely proves the injustice of the law.

Since his conviction an effort has been made to create the impression that it was due in a great measure to the fact that he published the only daily newspaper in Chicago which championed the cause of free silver. Such an impression is incorrect. He was indicted and convicted before his paper had gained any notoriety as an advocate of free coinage. If the claim were made that the enforcement of his penitentiary sentence was due in part to the political attitude of his paper it would not be incredible. It is possible, and not improbable, that the imprisonment part of his sentence would have been remitted if his attitude toward the other Chicago newspapers had been less defiant.

Now I admit it is my belief that Mr. Dunlop was technically guilty and was legally convicted, but I do not think his punishment is justifiable. I do not mean that there should be made in his favor any discrimination between him, the wealthy publisher of a great newspaper, and the poorest and meanest man convicted on a similar charge. I will not waste space in denouncing the unjust law which has sent to the prison cell so many real public benefactors. Its monstrosity ought to be apparant to every reader of a newspaper. But, even admitting the justice of the law (merely for the sake of argument, for I believe it not only unjust but unconstitutional) the penalty imposed is unjust and against public policy. Even a governmentalist, if he be humane, must admit that punishment is not a just function of government. Penalties for crimes should be for the purpose of either restitution, reform or restraint. Punishment in retaliation is an act of vengeance which should have no place outside of barbarism.

If Mr. Dunlop's alleged crime injured anybody the only restitution he could make was by paying for it. The jurors seemed to take this as part of their view and they assessed against him a fine of $2,000. But in addition to this the penitentiary sentence was imposed. What for? Not for restitution, for the government must pay for his maintenance while he is in prison. Not to reform him, for he discontinued the publication of that class of advertisements as soon as he was indicted. Not to restrain him from again printing such advertisements; for the imposition of the fine convinced him that such publications were unprofitable. The penitentiary sentence then was an act of vengeance and such an act never yet had a good effect on a law-breaker.

The sentence is against public policy because it is an act of vengeance. It is against public policy because it smacks of persecution which is abhorrent to the lovers of personal liberty. Hence it creates disrespect for the law, the courts and the government. It tends to make a martyr of a man upon whom it seeks to heap ignominy, and thereby it defeats its own aim. In fact the imprisonment of Mr. Dunlop will not make him a better citizen; it will not make vice more abhorred and virtue more respected; it will be an expense to the tax-payers for his maintenance while in prison and I can not see that it will benefit anybody, unless it be to gratify the spite of his personal enemies and increase the vindictive joy of the self-constituted regulators of other people's business.

In this connection I would say that Mr. Dunlop declares he submitted copies of his paper to governmental authorities and asked them to pass upon the legality of just such advertisements as those on which his indictment was based. They refused to give an opinion and for more than two years his paper was regularly received at the Chicago post office and transmitted through the mails and no objection was made, although the same kind of advertisements were printed in nearly every issue. This being the case, he was in some degree justifiable in believing he was not violating the postal laws. Further than this he showed his regard for those laws by omitting lottery advertisements from the mail editions of his paper although such advertisements were printed in the editions sold in the streets.

It seems only fair that the publisher of a newspaper should be officially notified that it contains unmailable matter before any steps are taken to indict him or exclude his paper from the mails. In such a case I believe few editors would be indicted for such offenses. They would, as a rule, eliminate such matter from the paper rather than incur the penalty. So long as the definition of obscenity is left to a jury easily influenced by conventional prejudice and the eloquent indignation of hired attorneys the liberty of the press is a delusion and it becomes a crime to teach even the most important facts of physiology.

"Restricted Currency."

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

I had supposed, until I read friend Harman's remarks in Lucifer, No. 656, that I was arguing for unrestricted currency; but I must admit that I do favor a little restriction, and I will define how much.

1. Any currency, no matter by whom issued, must state on its face, at least by implication, exactly what it represents. A counterfeit coin or bill should not be permitted. And for individuals to issue coins or bills and call them "dollars" would be a lie.

2. No currency should be a legal tender in the payment of debts contracted to be paid in something else.

That is all the restriction that I now think of as necessary. Any one should be allowed to coin money of any kind he pleases, and print bills of any kind he pleases, provided they do not so resemble other coins or bills as to be liable to be mistaken for them, in which case they would be counterfeits. Any one should be allowed to receive such coins or bills in the payment of debts, or for property or services; but to compel him to receive them would be robbery. All the restriction is to protect, first from fraud, and second from robbery.

A Last Word.

BY LOIS WAISBROOKER.

Just a little explanation and it shall be my last word, for a long time at least, on this subject of contracepts. In my article in which I speak of Ruedebusch, Harman, et. al. practicing continence, I should have said teach men to practice continence. I really meant the sex and not those particular men, and yet I do not believe in continence as a rule any more than I do contracepts. I believe sex-association the natural right of the race, but I have heard men say that with a little care there was no need of a man impregnating a woman. I do not know if this is so, but men have told me so, and what I wished to say was, Throw the responsibility on your own sex, not upon ours. If there must be care upon either side let the men assume it.

By the way, I have a case for Comstock. A lady who bore children oftener than she wished had a husband who was a trance medium—was controlled by a spirit doctor. This lady questioned this spirit doctor as to whether there was no way to avoid becoming pregnant when she did not desire it, and while her husband was thus entranced she received through his lips full instructions which she has carried out successfully. Now what will Comstock do about it? arrest the spirit, the man for what he said when not conscious, the woman for carrying out the instructions received, or all three? I can show him the man and the woman if he will come here, and perhaps he is smart enough to catch the spirit with the help of a few policemen.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Thus chatting in a friendly way Alice was endeavoring to array Cora in a pretty gown of soft, clinging, warm-hued material, but the fussy little woman was far too excited to be of any real use, and not until Imelda appeared, already dressed, was her toilet completed. With deft and ready fingers Imelda lent the needed assistence, then selecting some of the bright hued flowers from a vase filled with the various blooms of midsummer, and which was standing upon a small table near one of the open windows, she twined them in the dark chestnut coils, then fastening a bunch at the snowy throat and standing at a distance she measured her sister with a critical and admiring look.

"Now look at yourself. Do you think you would please a fastidious eye?" The vision that met her gaze as she turned to the mirror was a mixture of girlish sweetness and of serious womanly dignity. Returning health and strength were filling the fair form with a roundness and tingeing the serious, half-sad face with exquisite color. Cora passed more than a passing glance at the reflected full-length image, and while she looked the eyes of both fair women in attendance were watching her face, and presently they saw the lips quiver, the eyelids droop and the crystal drops force their way from under them and cling like liquid pearls to the dark lashes. Imelda's face bent over her sister's till it rested on the dark-crowned head. Instinctively she felt what the thoughts were that caused the tears to gather, but she had not one word to say. Cora's well hand went up to Imelda's face and her lips whispered,

"He whom my appearance would please is not here; so what does it so much matter?"

Imelda shook her head and forced a smile to her lips.

"Ah, but, little sister, it does matter. Don't you know that you are to meet someone else tonight that I wish so much to be pleased!" Playfully smiling she lifted the drooping face and looked into the tear-wet eyes. The questioning look in them suddenly gave way to one of understanding.

"I had forgotten that I was of some importance tonight. Yes, you are right. It does matter, and I do want to please."

Dinner was now announced and the trio descended to the dining room. Here Lawrence Westcot was awaiting them. Imelda had not seen him since the unpleasant meeting with Frank in the garden, and unexpectedly finding herself opposite the dark-eyed passionate man threatened momentarily to disconcert her. A flush mounted to her brow, then receded, leaving it marble white. But quickly regaining her self-possession she saw that no one had noticed anything amiss. Mr. Westcot came forward and in a few well chosen words expressed his pleasure at her return; next he acknowledged the introduction to Cora, for a moment closely studying her face. The dinner came off rather quietly to say nothing of the feeling of restraint felt by all. Alice seemed to have lost the fear that for so long had been a drawback to her full recovery, at least it was not now so apparent, but there was no confidence as yet establishe between herself and Mr. Westcot. They were more like strangers who found the task of getting acquainted a tedious and irksome one. Imelda, with the consciousness that the memories of the past brought her, felt great constraint, and it is not to be wondered at that Cora felt the influence thus brought to bear upon her, and felt quite uncomfortable. The ladies spoke in monosyllables, and although the efforts of Lawrence Westcot to produce something like a flow of conversation, to bring a feeling of harmony to the little company, were almost incessant they fell decidedly flat. So when the meal was brought to a close the feelings that were retained were anything but pleasant. Lawrence made his excuses almost instantly and withdrew, thus clearing the field and leaving the ladies to themselves. They were not slow in taking advantage of the fact that they were alone, and as the husband paced the veranda the voices of the chatting and laughing women came very clearly to his hearing. A bitter smile curved his lips. He felt that he was no longer welcome in his own home. Yet was any one to blame but himself? But what had he done, he asked himself, other than men were wont to do? Nothing! he felt sure. But an inward voice whispered,

"These women are not like other women. You have not understood them, but have taken it for granted that they were the same. When too late you recognized the fact, and all your efforts to set yourself right in your own home have been vain. Yet have these efforts been all they should have been? Have you in reality done all that could be done?"

He leaned against a pillar and gazed into the darkening shadows of the coming night while thought chased thought. Yes! he would make one more effort, for was not the life he was living in his palatial home fast becoming unbearable? While he was dreaming with open eyes a queenly head appeared before him, crowned with a glorious wealth of dark hair. Passionately dark eyes emitted flashes of fire, scornful in their scintillations.

Passing his hand over his eyes with an impatient movement he heaved a weary sigh and in a tone that was almost a moan the words broke from his lips, "Why, O why is this all!"

Just then a step aroused him, and glancing up the friend of other days stood before him. Very seldom indeed had Norman Carlton favored Maplelawn with his presence in these later days. The harmony that had once existed there was broken, though he did not understand why, and in consequence remained away. Westcot had long ago recognized the injustice of the unmanly words he had in a fit of passion hurled at his wife, and if he had needed proof that he was wrong, Carlton's remaining away during the enforced absence of Imelda Ellwood and his sudden reappearance at the very moment of her return, ought to give him that proof. But to do him justice, he no longer needed it, and if he believed he had read correctly a secret page in her life he knew only too well who it was that had digressed farthest from the prescribed line. Norman would have passed him but he laid a detaining hand upon his arm.

"I understand the attraction," said Westcot, "but no harm will be done if you will give me a half hour first. We have been drifting apart, and I would not have it so. Something has gone out of my life, leaving it empty; and sometimes life itself seems a burden. Will you assist me to make a reparation?"

A look of surprise overspread the face of the young man. Then he hastened to say:

"Certainly I will. Have we not always been fast friends in the past? I have no desire to let a friendship of almost lifelong standing die a death so sudden."

"Then come," said Westcot, and together they wended their way down through the grounds, and were soon lost in the shadows. When they returned an hour had passed. Both faces were perhaps a shade paler, a shade more serious, but the old confidence has been restored. What overtures had been made, what words spoken will never perhaps be revealed, but firmly clasping hands Norman spoke:

"You have my advice!"

"And I will follow it!"

"Thank you! You have spoken like a man. Under the circumstances I think it is the only way that is open and I am a poor judge of human nature in general, and of women in particular, if such a proceeding as you now contemplate will not restore peace and confidence to the little circle under your roof."

With a last glance into the eyes of the other he dropped his hand and entered the room where the trio of women were trying to while away the hours that were to bring at least one fair girl's friend and lover. Just as he stepped across the low French window Imelda was running her fingers across the key board of the piano. Cora was standing by her side. Ere he had advanced more than a step a voice of singular sweetness arose and filled the room. In an instant more a second manly face appeared in the frame of the open window. All unconscious of her audience the girl gave full vent in song to the feelings that swelled her breast. The notes rose and fell and vibrated, until the very air seemed to be full of life and feeling. With bated breath the men stood and listened, forgetful of aught else but the rare sweet music of the young pathetic voice; a voice that possessed the power of carrying them away beyond themselves. The song was a translation from the German by Heine—the famous "Lorelei," a selection well calculated to try the strength and compass of the voice that attempts it. Its weird and melancholy pathos moved the inmost hearts of the listeners. As the last vibrant notes died away the sound of applauding hands fell upon the ear, and hastily turning the trio espied the two men, standing just where they had entered. A blush overspread the face of the fair singer. It was the first time that other ears than those of Owen Hunter had listened to the magic sound of that voice when raised in song.

With a quick movement Imelda stepped forward and with outstretched hand greeted the new comer. By the heightened color of her face and the happy light that shone in the lustrous dark eyes Cora quickly judged who it was that so suddenly had stepped into their midst, and in a moment more was bowing in acknowledgment of the introduction which had followed. As she felt the searching glance the clear eyes bent upon her Cora again felt the tell-tale blood mount to her face, but with an effort overcoming the embarrassed feeling she openly returned the look. That which Norman Carlton saw within the depth of the hazel eyes must have been satisfactory for, extending his hand with a firm quick motion he said:

"I am"——pleased, he was going to say but changed it to —"glad to meet Imelda's sister"—emphasizing the "sister." "I hope we may be friends."

"Thank you." Scarcely above a whisper, and with a fluttering breath, the words dropped from the slightly trembling lips, and one felt, rather than heard, the depths of feeling contained in the two little words. In that moment Cora knew that she had found another friend. His words were no idle phrase. Imelda also understood, and her heart gave a great bound. Did it not mean much? She took a step backward,—she wanted the two to become better acquainted. Would they have anything to say to each other? A little while she would leave them together. Turning to the side of Alice who was carelessly standing just a little beyond, plucking the scarlet blossoms of a geranium to pieces, while her glance traveled a little nervously to the man who was still standing by the open window. What did it all mean?

For weeks now Mr. Westcot had studiously avoided meeting his wife. His meals were either taken late or away from home, and the drawing room had not once known his presence in all that time. Was the old life about to be taken up again? The white teeth sank into the red lips and a tremor seized and shook her form. She raised her hand in search of a support. Imelda saw her reel, and with a quick movement caught her in her arms. But another also had watched this little by-play, and a few strides brought Lawrence Westcot to the side of the woman he called his wife. Pouring a little ice water from the pitcher that was standing near by he held it to her lips.

"Drink," he said. Quietly obeying she drank a few swallows. Pushing a large easy chair forward in such position as would shield her face from the glaring light of the chandelier, he would have led her to it, but she evaded his hand and managed to reach it unaided. Bending over her he inquired the cause of her sudden indisposition. Nervously she answered:

"Nothing. It is nothing. I will be better in a moment. The coming home of the girls must have excited me. I thought I was stronger than I am." Was it an anxious look he bent upon her? He did not speak, however, and quietly withdrew.

LOVE, MARRIAGE, AND DIVORCE

And the Sovereignty of the Individual.

A Discussion between Henry James, Horace Greely, and Stephen Pearl Andrews. There are here included the final replies of Mr. Andrews, refused by the New York Tribune, and a subsequent discussion, occurring twenty years later, between Mr. James and Mr. Andrews.

"The great lesson for the world to learn is that HUMAN BEINGS DO NOT NEED TO BE TAKEN CARE OF. What they do need is such conditions of justice and freedom and friendly co-operation that they can take care of themselves. Provided for by another, and subject to his will as the return tribute, they pine, and sicken, and die. This is true equally of women as of men: as true of wives as it is of vassals or serfs. Our whole existing marital system is the house of bondage and the slaughter-house of the female sex. Whether the evils are inherent or incidental, whether they belong to the essence or the administration of the institution, whether they are remediable without or only by means of revolution, are the questions that now have to be discussed."

The Truth.

Friend, though thy soul should burn thee, yet be still,
Thoughts were not made for strife nor tongues for swords.
He that sees clear is gentlest of his words,
And that's not truth that hath the heart to kill.

The Tragedy at Boston—Samuel P. Putnam and May L. Collins.

Some one has said that the ending of every life is a tragedy. That no matter how calm and peaceful; no matter how painless, how joyous or triumphant, even; no matter how well-rounded, how successful, how fully crowned with years and with honors the life of any human being may be, its termination is a tragedy, a calamity, a disaster. If life has been a success, a blessing, an honor, a glory to its possessor its loss is to be deplored, not only for the sake of the loser himself but because of the good he could have done for others if life had been prolonged. If life has been a failure, a mistake, a sorrow, a despair, so much the greater need that it should be prolonged, so that mistakes could be corrected and that success, joy and honor might yet take the place of failure, of sorrow and of dishonor.

However this may be it seems very true that the sudden ending of the mortal careers of Samuel P. Putnam and of May L. Collins, at Boston on the night of the 13th of December last—the one in what is commonly considered the prime of mature manhood, and the other in the first years of strong, self-centered womanhood, had in it much of the tragic, the disastrous, the mournful, the sorrowful,—not to say the pitiful. To many of the surviving friends of these two distinguished representatives of modern progressive thought this untimely ending has seemed to involve a loss that is nearly if not quite irreparable. Some have said that this tragedy has given the Freethought cause a set-back from which it will take at least twenty-five years to recover.

But are these views philosophical? are they truly rational? Is there ever any real loss, ever any real disaster or tragedy, in any of nature's realms? In the domain of physics—so-called—it is now universally conceded that there can be no real loss, whether of matter or of energy. No atom of matter, no measure or quantum of force, is ever annihilated, or made less, but only changes its form, its phenomena or mode of motion, disappearing at one place to reappear in some other place or at some other time.

Reasoning analogically, is it not probable, if not demonstrable, that the same principle, the same mode of action (or of being) holds true and good in all of Nature's realms? While endless in diversity, is there not also unity as to general principles or methods in Nature's great workshop? If we held the keys to all her arcana I think we should find Dame Nature wonderful in simplicity as well as in variety and in multiplicity.

If this view be the correct one, is it philosophical to speak of the "Boston tragedy" of December 1896, or of the "Chicago tragedy" of November 1887?

If nothing is ever lost; if conservation of matter and force has its counterpart in conservation of mind, of thought, of feeling, of life itself—whatever that mysterious force or entity called life may mean,—where then is the loss in the case of the rope-strangled Parsons, Spies, Engel and Fischer, or in the case of the gas-poisoned Putnam and Collins?

Whether the principle called "conservation of matter and force" extends to the realm of personal consciousness, or whether personal consciousness survives the disorganization and disappearance of the physical body, it may not be profitable here to discuss, but that the principle or rule of action sometimes called the law of Use is everywhere operative, and always commendable, requires little or no argument. In accord with this law or principle we may say that the lives, the recorded deeds, the expressed thoughts, the examples, the mental and moral characteristics of Samuel Putnam and May Collins are now the property of the women and the men who survive them, and who can be made better, wiser and happier by the object lessons given by these individual human entities. As each generation of animal or vegetable organisms utilizes the component elements that entered into the organisms of their predecessors so the actors on the stage of human life may and should utilize, as a heritage, the thoughts, deeds, characteristics, etc., of those who have played their part and passed off the stage.

"The proper study of mankind is man," says a poet philosopher. "We live in deeds, not years," said another. It matters not whether those who give us useful object lessons made their entrance upon the stage of life earlier or later than we ourselves; the important question for us, in this instance, is, how can we make our own lives richer, nobler, truer, better, by utilizing the legacy left by our brother man and sister woman so lately here with us but now gone from sight and sound—gone, so far as we certainly know, for all time.

By some readers it may be considered late in the day to write a leading article for Lucifer upon an event that occurred six months ago. If such objection find lodgment in the mind of anyone I would briefly reply thus:

Instead of too late it is yet much too early to write an impartial, an unbiased, estimate of the life and character of the now historic individual known in life as Samuel Porter Putnam, because of the animosities, the personal antagonisms that he was so unfortunate (or so fortunate) as to arouse among his cotemporaries. It has been well said that no really great man's history can be written during his life or during the life of the generation immediately following his death.

Whether Mr. Putnam was a really great man or not I do not pretend to say, but I know that he held important offices in two or three national Freethought organizations; that he had been for many years a prominent and popular lecturer; had been an organizer and conductor of national as well as local conventions of Freethinkers; was author of quite a number o. books; a prominent contributor to many Freethought journals, and for some years was co-editor of a weekly paper called "Freethought," published at San Francisco, California.

Under these circumstances it was impossible that he should escape enmities, misunderstandings, antagonisms, misrepresentations, and during the life-time of those who assail, as well as those who defend him, it will be difficult if not impossible to write and publish an unbiased estimate of his character and of the work he did. He who attempts this task will place himself between two fires, and will find it impossible to avoid the imputation of bias for or against the subject of his writing.

This is one cause of delay in writing and publishing my own personal opinion or estimate of the character and the life-work of the late President of the American Secular Union. Another reason for delay is the fact that Mr E. C. Walker, and others who were in better position to know the persons, and the facts pertaining to the tragedy, so-called, had written up the matter at some length, and had given their estimate of the significance of the sad occurrence in its relation to the cause with which the deceased were so intimately connected. The publication of the facts as seen by these writers seemed to leave little for me to say, and so I said very little, and should probably have continued silent had it not been that my own position, and the attitude of Lucifer in relation to the matter have been assailed and misrepresented in more than one Freethought publication.

In the January number of the "Free Thougbt Magazine," edited and published by H. L. Green of this city, appeared a long editorial giving Mr. Green's estimate of the causes that led to the tragedy, and connecting the name of Lucifer and its conductors with that of Mr. Putnam, in a way that seemed to call upon me for explanation and refutation I therefore asked, as a matter of simple justice, that I be allowed to set the editor and his readers right as to the work we are attempting to do, and also to give my own estimate of the significance of the Boston disaster upon the work of "sex reform," or of the marriage question. Space in the April number of the "Free Thought Magazine" was granted for part of my statement, but the part relating to the Mr. Putnam and Miss Collins as alleged exponents of the "Freedom of Sex" movement was crowded out. At the close of my article, to which Mr. Green gave the name "A Free Lover's Creed," I stated that a copy of Lucifer giving my opinion of the "relation of the Boston tragedy to the marriage question," would be sent free to all applicants—intending to publish in Lucifer the matter for which there was no room in the "Free Thought Magazine." Many applications have been received asking for such statement, but from various causes it has been delayed until now.

This statement I now propose to make, and knowing so well the difficulties involved in such undertaking I ask in advance the forbearance of my readers, if in anything it appear to them that I am influenced by prejudice, or by personal likes or dislikes, or by resentment against the man or the men who, as it seems to me, have grossly misrepresented and still continue to misrepresent Lucifer and its conductors. While not claiming to be above or beyond personal resentments I try always to remember that all men, like all inanimate objects, "move along the lines of least resistance," and that when it comes to the last analysis of actions we all do as we must, and that therefore there is no place for praise or blame, in a scientific or philosophic sense. In other words, that when all conditions are considered—of heredity and environment—all men and all women are good or bad alike.

After this long prelude, which to me seemed necessary to a full understanding of the causes that induce me to monopolize Lucifer's space this week, I proceed to quote a few of the paragraphs from the "Free Thought Magazine" that in my thinking give a false coloring to the attitude of Lucifer in its relation to the cause of "Sex Freedom," and of Human Freedom in general. In the January "Free Thought Magazine" appear the following paragraphs:

> We hardly think it necessary for us to present more evidence to show that Mr. Putnam was a firm believer in the free-love theory of marriage. We notice that Lucifer, the organ of the free lovers of this country, has had more praise for Mr. Putnam since his death than all the Free Thought journals. Even the "Truth Seeker" has not published such high encomiums. And we have noticed that at Mr. Putnam's conventions in Chicago, the free lovers were very largely represented.—p. 55.
> And we noticed the other day that when Mr. Foote intimated in an interview that free love was not a doctrine of Freethinkers, Lucifer took him to task for this heretical opinion. That a man can hardly be called a genuine Freethinker who believes in marriage is evidently Lucifer's opinion.—p. 56.

From these other paragraphs that might be adduced it is evident that the purpose of the editor of the "Free Thought Magazine" was to show that Mr. Putnam was a disciple or adherent of Sex-Freedom, or "free love theory of marriage," as he terms it, and that Lucifer as the "organ of the free lovers of this country" was or is the special friend and champion of Mr. Putnam. To these statements and inferences I would briefly as possible reply,

First, that Lucifer is not the "organ," or official mouthpiece, of any organization, sect or class of people. Lucifer is now, and has been for more than sixteen years, the medium of communication for liberty-loving people, of whatever name or of no name. Each writer is alone responsible for the sentiments or opinions set forth in her or his article.

Second. Of Mr. Putnam personally I knew but little; of his habits and opinions in sex matters I knew nothing. My first acquaintance with him was at Valley Falls, Kansas, some eleven or twelve years ago, when he was traveling as Secretary of the National Secular Union. Mr. Walker and I arranged a course of lectures for him at that place, which engagement was filled to mutual satisfaction. After that I met him at three national conventions of the same organization, managed mainly by him, and on none of those occasions did I ever hear him express himself on the marriage question, and do not remember ever reading anything from his pen that would indicate that he was not in accord with the average "orthodox" marriage code. I never thought to inquire whether he was a married man or not—never considered that it was any part of my business to do so. For many years I have taken the ground that every man's, and every woman's, private life is his or her own affair, and that so long as they do not offensively intrude their opinions and practices upon the notice of others the world at large has no right to criticize and comment adversely.

Mr. Green publishes, as evidence that Mr. Putnam was a "free lover," the fact that his wife obtained a divorce from him on the ground of "adultery," and also mentions, as further evidence, that he himself knew that Mr. Putnam, in company with a woman not his wife, registered at a hotel under an assumed name.

This line of argument, as Mr. Green should know, is very inconclusive; in fact no argument at all. Thousands of men and women, loyal to the marriage code, deliberately commit what the law calls adultery in order that their conjugal mates may have legal ground for divorce. This is often done by consent of all parties, or as it is called "by collusion." Whether such was the arrangement between Mr. Putnam and wife I have no means of knowing; have been told, however, by one of his personal friends that Mr. Putnam intended to fight the divorce suit against him, but was deceived by the lawyers who brought the case to trial without giving him proper notice.

Whether Mr. Putnam did right or wrong in the adjustment of his conjugal relations is not for me or for Mr. Green to decide I freely take the ground that these are matters with which the general public has nothing whatever to do, and if men and women sometimes, under the operation of invasive marriage laws and customs, resort to the expedient of assuming names other than their own, the fault probably lies with the laws and customs that tempt to or compel such deception, rather than with the persons themselves. Under the reign of "Liberty and Responsibility" there would be no occasion for such warlike measures.

I say "warlike" advisedly. In war it is considered right to deceive an enemy in all possible ways. Even Washington, he of "little hatchet" fame, deliberately lied to General Clinton when by intercepted letters he made that officer believe that he was about to attack New York when his real object was to steal a march on Lord Cornwallis. And the lie brought him success. Under antinatural marriage laws human society is in a state of war, and if "strategy" is resorted to it is the fault mainly of the laws themselves. I have seen or heard no evidence that Mr. Putnam ever deceived, assaulted or otherwise maltreated, any woman; or that he failed in his duty to any woman's child or children.

Elsewhere in his "Obituary Notice," in order to convict Mr. Putnam, and Lucifer as his alleged defender, Mr. Green makes the claim that Putnam's "drinking habit and free love doctrine finally were the primary cause that brought him and his young associate, Miss Collins, to their untimely death, and disgrace on the Liberal movement." The evidence he brings to establish this claim would certainly astonish a "Philadelphia lawyer," familiar as that legendary individual is supposed to be with intellectual gymnastics.

As to Mr. Putnam's drinking habit I know absolutely nothing, but from cotemporary evidence I am satisfied that he was not a total abstainer from intoxicating beverages. In all my interviews with him, however, I never noticed that he had been drinking, have sat at table with him often and never saw him drink anything stronger than coffee. But that he was intoxicated on the night of his death there seems not one particle of proof. That there was alcoholic liquor in the room in which his dead body was found is no proof of intoxication; liquors are often carried as medicine; neither was the fact that he had drunk wine at supper a few hours before, any proof of such physical condition. Thousands and millions of people drink wine at meals every day in the year who never were known to be intoxicated, as that word is commonly understood. The fact that Mr. Putnam could make a rapid run to catch a train, as was stated, after leaving the supper table is pretty strong proof to the contrary.

While the attempt to prove that drunkenness had anything to do with the death of Mr. Putnam and Miss Collins shows Mr. Green to have peculiar notions in regard to logical sequences his effort to bring in his alleged "free love doctrine" as a factor in producing the "untimely death" of these two persons is still more amazing. It is simply the despair of logic, the negation of logic, if I know what logic means. As has been pointed out often before, the statement that the bodies were "fully clothed" when found, and the "bed clothes undisturbed" may have some logical connection with the query as to "when and how the bodies fell from the bed to the floor," but few logicians would probably be able to see the sequence, the natural connection, the one with the other.

Once more: Suppose the facts had been favorable to Mr. Green's hypothesis. Suppose, for the argument, that, S. P. Putnam and May L. Collins had died in each other's arms, undressed and in bed together. What then? Would it logically follow that their death was due to the fact that no priest or magistrate had given them permission to occupy the same room and same bed? Is a marriage certificate an infallible protector against asphyxiation by gas, or against violent death of all kinds?

Not wishing to fill the entire current issue of Lucifer with this one article I must condense, and will just add in reference to Mr. Putnam that this is not written from the standpoint of a partisan. As most of my friends know there was little of sympathy or cordiality between the President of the Secular Union and myself. His line of work and mine were by no means identical. That he did good work in defeating the machinations of the reactionists who are trying to secure a "revival of Puritanism" in this country I think everyone cognizant of the facts will admit, and if he honestly believed that the cause of secularism "should not be hampered with such questions as free love, socialism, etc.," to quote the language of Mr. Watts in the London "Freethinker" when speaking of the American Secular movement, it is not for me to criticise him harshly for his opinion, or for his concentration on the line of work that to him seemed most important. What I say here is mainly to show that the charge is untrue that I have been biased in favor of Mr. Putnam or that "Lucifer has prostituted itself most abominably in this matter," as expressed by one whose good opinion I have highly prized, and still highly prize.

It is true that what has been published in our columns in regard to him has been commendatory rather than otherwise. I have allowed others to give their opinions—have published the funeral discourse by Mr. Washburn, and the brief statement by Mr. Reichwald, Secretary of the organization of which Mr. Putnam was president. These men were in position to know whereof they spoke, and if they have given the deceased higher eulogiums than the facts would warrant, the moral responsibility of such publication rests with them and not with Lucifer's editor.

While Mr. Putnam could defend himself, some sharp criticisms of his language and methods were inserted in Lucifer, and if he had lived, more would doubtless have appeared in our columns, but Lucifer does not fight the dead! Whatever his faults, his mistakes, his vices, if we choose to call them such, and he doubtless had his share, the record is made, the account closed, and he no longer here to defend or explain, and to some of us it seems a ghoulish business to drag his faults and failings before the public eye. If Mr. Putnam wronged anyone in regard to money or other property this matter is one for private adjustment with his executors, rather than for public discussion and reprobation.

To my thinking, Mr. Putnam was a genius, poetic, and somewhat emotional if not erratic, and such men do not often succeed as men of affairs, men of practical business, as we term it. He was open-hearted and open-handed, to a fault, but that he was dishonest in his dealings with his fellow-men is hard for me to believe.

As a last word let me say that whatever his faults I think there are few of us so good that we can afford to cast stones. Take the charge of "adultery," one of the sins of which Mr. Putnam is accused by the editor of the "Free Thought Magazine." How many men, not eunuchs, could stand the test: "Whosoever looketh upon a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart?" If Mr. Green rejects this Biblical test he is ruled out of court, for technical adultery is an ecclesiastic offense. In the court of rationalism it has no meaning, as used in canon and statute law.

MAY L. COLLINS.

Of Miss Collins I need say but little. No defense of her memory is called for. She had been before the public but a very few years and during this brief period had made a record of which any woman might be proud. No need of any defense or any eulogy from us who knew her only during her short visit to Chicago, during the Secular Congress held here in November last. While in this city she made frequent calls at Lucifer's office, always expressing much interest in the work to which it and "Our New Humanity" are devoted. We had the pleasure of hearing her deliver three or four addresses, two of which, as we believe, have been published in pamphlet form. That she fully sympathized with the movement for Free Womanhood and Motherhood we have good reason to believe. Her music teacher, Prof. De Roode, in a letter to the Cincinnati "Commercial Tribune" says this of her:

> "So long," said she, "as various States in this Union deny to married women the right to own their own children or property I will not marry. The crowning disgrace of our country is that if a mother would own her children she must bear them illegitimately. If ever I meet a man whom I can love I may live with him, but with the present laws I will never marry him." I

WHILE to some readers this issue of Lucifer will seem mainly devoted to personal controversy it is not so intended. The "Free Thought Magazine" and its editor are recognized as exponents of conservative thought on the social or marriage question, and this number of Lucifer is our reply, long delayed, to the attacks of the conservative or reactionary wing of the Freethought army. It is hoped there will not be occasion soon again for so much of what seems of a personal nature. In the extracts from letters, under the head "Various Voices," taken somewhat at random, I have avoided those that would be most apt to give offense.

Hero Worship and "Trusts."

That the American people are not different from those of other countries was demonstrated in a very striking manner a few weeks ago at the time of the "dedication"—I think it was, of the monument erected to the memory of Ulysses Simpson Grant. The daily papers, at the time, were largely filled with the details of what was called the greatest demonstration of its kind ever seen in the United States, and scarcely ever equalled anywhere in the world.

This enormous display, this phenomenal pageant, was cited by such papers as the New York "World" as evidence that we as a people are not dissatisfied with the working of our "institutions,"—our political, governmental, financial and social institutions in general, of which institutions the man Grant was a conspicuous product and exponent.

Especially was it noted that the people, as a whole, cannot be suffering physically from or because of the inequalities that result from our industrial and financial systems,—as charged so constantly by the industrial and finance reform leaders and papers. In other words, that the general appearance and deportment of the vast crowds of people that turned out on that day to do honor to the memory of "America's greatest general,"—as some are pleased to call him, was the best possible proof that there is not with us today the wide-spread suffering and discontent that is said to exist, by "Populists," "Bryanists," and other political agitators.

While this interpretation of the significance of the memorial pageant may be superficial, and may be tinged with partisan bias, there is certainly much of truth in it. It is doubtless true that intelligent discontent has not yet reached the masses of people, as it must, before any real change for the better can be hoped for. The great masses of people that throng the cities of America today are much like those that swarmed the seven hills of imperial Rome in the time of the Cæsars. Give them a hero to worship, to fight and die for, and give them bread and spectacular shows, and they were content. Any real conception of what liberty means, of what equity or justice means, of what real manhood and womanhood means, had not dawned upon their minds.

And just so it is today in the Western Empire, known as the United States of America. The crowding of the poorer classes, the agriculturists and artisans as well as the commercial classes, into the great centers of population, is rapidly developing the state of things that existed in ancient Rome, that existed in France, before the "Revolution," and that now exist in most of the European monarchies, where the divine right of the king, of the noble and of the priest to rule and rob the masses of people are scarcely questioned.

Here we have not yet the titled nobility to claim their right to privileges denied to the common herd, but we have that which is equally destructive to liberty and justice, quite as debasing to true manhood and womanhood, we have hero-worship and mammon-worship—worship of the gold-standard dollar, and worship of the man who can command the most of these dollars, no matter how he succeeds in getting them. We have our nobility, also our king—our kingly president, our lordly senate, our irresponsible supreme court, our hierarchies,—priestly rulers, etc., but we have not yet the honesty to call things by their right names.

Trusts and combines, by which the profits of trade or distribution, as well as of production, are controlled and monopolized by the few, are rapidly taking the place of the old system of competitive industry and of competitive distribution of the products of labor. Some reformers are calling loudly for legislation to prevent this rapid tendency to monopolistic concentration, but it requires little reflection, as some of us think, and little knowledge of history to show that all such attempts will prove futile. What we really need is not more law—not a weeding out of some of the branches of the tree of evil, but less law—less interference with, or invasion of, the natural right to a share of the earth and its opportunities, and especially less legislative interference with or invasion of the natural right to self-ownership of and by the producers of men!

Here is the invasion of invasions, the monopoly of monopolies, the trust of trusts, viz.: The Marriage Trust—the invasion of, the control of, the reproductive resources and functions of the mothers of the race by priest-craft, or by the so-called statute law.

Until this fundamental wrong, this parent invasion, this most baneful and most nearly universal of all the wrongs, invasions and "trusts" can be abolished, there will be little headway made in the real work of reforming or abolishing the evils of our present ill-adjusted social and governmental systems.

The Tragedy at Boston.

I believe Mr. Putnam is the first man who ever attracted Miss Collins, and that she believed her course of action right and pure I am certain. Her nature tended in an opposite direction from the immoral or gross in life.

Whether in Mr. Putnam she had found "a man she could love," and whether she practicalized her natural right to "live with him," is a question no one seems able to answer; but if it can be shown that she did so; that she had the courage of her convictions and was willing to take the consequences, whatever they might be, then we can confidently predict that future generations will honor her for so doing, and that her name will be enrolled high among those who have helped to prepare the way for a truer, nobler, better humanity than earth has yet known.

But whether she practicalized, in its fullest sense, her right to self-ownership, or not, her brave and noble utterances can never be forgotten by those who knew her, nor by those who will hereafter learn of her life and her work. A movement is now on foot to erect a marble monument to her memory, but a better and more enduring monument is the contribution that she has made to the literature of progress; a monument which, as the poet Horace says, will be "more enduring than brass," or than the "pyramids" that were erected to perpetuate the name and the fame of kings and conquerors of the prehistoric world.

Briefly summed up, my answer to those who ask for my opinion as to the significance of the "Boston tragedy, in its relation to the marriage question" I would say that to my thinking Mr. Green has totally and disastrously failed to show that the "untimely deaths" of these two persons has any significance such as he has tried to give it, by calling Mr. Putnam a "free lover," and saying that the tragedy was, in any degree or manner, owing to the alleged fact that Mr. Putnam had "embraced the free love theory." So far as any real evidence was given in the "Free Thought Magazine" there is nothing whatever to show that Mr. Putnam accepted the "Creed" of "Love in Freedom." Anonymous testimony such as Mr. Green cites, is no evidence at all.

Whether Mr. Putnam and Miss Collins were lovers in any sense, or not, seems to be simply matter of vague conjecture, and if it could be shown that they were lovers in the fullest possible sense, that fact would have not the slightest logical connection with the other fact that their bodies were found dead in an apartment house in Boston on the morning of the thirteenth of last December. It is simply a case of what logicians call non sequitur—"it does not follow."

A "Correction" that Does Not Correct.

The "Freethought Magazine" for May contains this editorial paragraph at the head of its column of "All Sorts:"

Moses Harman calls our attention to the fact, which we had not noticed, that the editorial extract that we quoted from Lucifer, on page 183 of the April Magazine, was written by his daughter, Lillian Harman, and not by himself, and asks us to make the correction, which we here do. But we cannot understand the condition of a man's mental and moral apparatus, who, after publishing such abominable sentiments in his editorial pages, when they are quoted against him, endeavors to avoid the odium by charging them to his daughter. And still Mr. Harman claims to be par excellence the special friend of women. But, after all, this may be a hereditary fault with Brother Harman, running back to the Garden of Eden, where old Grandfather Adam, hiding in the garden shrubbery, doubled up with the green apple colic, declared it was all the fault of "the woman whom thou gavest to be with me." Most surely these free lovers are strange people.

Yes, it may be quite true that Lucifer's editor is a bad chip from a bad, bad old block; that he inherits all the little and big meannesses attributed to grandfather Adam. But while looking for hereditary causes of crookedness I suggest that it might be well for Mr. Green to study the character of one Joab, as shown by his treatment of Amasa. "Art thou in health, my brother?"—then while kissing him he stabs Amasa to death, "smiting him under the fifth rib."

In word, tone and manner Neighbor Green is the mildest mannered of men, profuse in his use of "Brother." How does deed correspond with profession? Here are the facts:

Finding nothing in my "Creed" as published in his issue of April upon which to hang an indictment against me he seems to have searched through back numbers of Lucifer for something more suitable to his purpose. Failing to find anything in the editorial columns he fixed upon a reply written by my daughter under her own name and in the correspondence columns. By telling his readers that I wrote this article, and by twisting it to suit his purpose he succeeded in making what he considered a point against me.

The worst feature of the matter, however, is the attempt to show that I want to shirk the responsibility of the "odium" of the alleged "abominable sentiments" by "charging them to my daughter." In my published reply to his first criticism I showed that there was really no important difference between myself and daughter, that it was the use he made of the article rather than its authorship I objected to. I wrote him twice calling his attention to his inexcusable blunders, calling them by no harsher name. He replied by asking for another copy of our issue of Feb. 24 containing the original article written by my daughter. And now he returns to the attack in a way that makes me doubt the man's sanity, either of intellect or of moral rectitude. Twice in this short paragraph he repeats the falsehood that the criticised article was published as editorial, and again he reiterates the amazing insinuation that I blame my daughter, or wish to put her in the "fault."

To show just what the "abominable sentiments" are, we reproduce the entire article—"Freedom of Choice, A Foundation Principle," as first printed in issue of Feb. 24.

In his issue of January Mr. Green says the "Free love doctrine" is the "direct road to hell." Like the average churchman, it is always "hell for the other fellow." But how about the text that says "all liars shall have their portion in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone?"

In all seriousness, however, I would ask, does a good cause need the help of such tactics as these?

Freedom of Choice, the Foundation Principle.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

DEAR LILLIAN HARMAN:—I am receiving Lucifer regularly and read it with pride and pleasure. When I have finished reading I hand them around to neighbors. I am a tyro in this line of work and thought, and there are several points that I do not fully understand as yet, and would like to get some information that is more explicit relative to sexual knowledge.

Now in regard to "Motherhood in Freedom." Does this mean that any woman who is living with a man can choose any other man for the purpose of procreation as she sees fit?

What is to be understood by complex paternity and how is this accomplished? . . . CARRIE L. ——, Ore. co.

The idea elucidated in "Motherhood in Freedom" is that a woman should be free to choose the best conditions available when she wishes to become a mother. This includes her right to choose a man other than her husband if she considers that other man better fitted mentally and physically for fatherhood.

Such choice is necessarily conditional on the willingness of the man she prefers. For instance, a woman may live with and love a man who is consumptive or scrofulous, and thereby unfitted for fatherhood. She may be physically able to bear, and both may intensely desire a child. Now conventional morality would say that she must bear a child by her husband or remain childless as long as he lives. We hold, on the contrary, that to bring a child into life with such a heritage of impaired vitality would be an act of injustice to it, while to deny her right to become the mother of a happy, healthy child is a cruel deprivation to her.

Now suppose that she loves another man, one who is physically sound, yet her love for her husband renders it impossible for her to leave him. If those immediately concerned desire the child to inherit the health and strength of the man in normal health, by what right can "society" object?

This is but one of millions of possible cases. The idea is that the persons most nearly affected can take all the factors into consideration more fully than can any mere theorizer, and therefore the decision should rest with them. Also, that as the woman has the most at stake, she should cast the deciding vote.

In short, the author does not mean to dictate what a woman must do when she assumes "motherhood in freedom." On the contrary, he advocates the removal of artificial restrictions and advises her to think for herself, to decide on that course of action which she feels will tend toward the highest development of herself and therefore of her child.

"Complex paternity" means, as I understand it, that a prospective mother may properly associate as unrestrainedly and innocently with those of the opposite sex as with her sisters, and with just as much freedom from fear of a possible approach to a conventional "danger line." It has been said in criticism of "Motherhood in Freedom" that "complex" maternity is just as possible as complex paternity; that a woman can obtain from other women and from good books, paintings and statuary, as much help as she can from the society of men. Whether she can or can not is not a question for the author, or for the critic, or for myself to decide. The woman concerned is the one to settle that question for herself, and for no one else. Our self-imposed task is to help, even though ever so little, to mould public opinion so that a woman may as freely choose her associates among the male as among the female sex; so that she may as innocently consult a man as a book; and we hope that soon the day will dawn when the pruriency now existing in the public mind will have vanished, and that people will no longer even "wonder" what degree of friendship exists between any man and woman.

Book Reviews.

BY J. M. C.

Shortly after the hanging of the so-called anarchists in Chicago in 1887 General M. M. Trumbull published a pamphlet entitled "A Trial of The Judgment" in which he clearly showed that the defendants were denied a legal trial by the action of the court in requiring all of them to be tried together, that the bailiff discriminated against them in summoning a certain class of men for jurors, that the jury was packed, that improper evidence was admitted against them, that the jury was improperly instructed, that the verdict was not in accord with the evidence and that the decision of the supreme court sustaining the criminal court was unfair, biased and not in accord with established precedents. The document created a great stir at the time and was pronounced by many able lawyers a masterful and convincing presentation of facts. General Trumbull was a man of remarkably clear intellect and was a republican in politics, holding little in common with the views of the condemned men as to methods of promoting social reform. He wrote his plea as a governmentalist and an upholder of the commonly accepted view of "law and order," claiming that it was a disgrace to a civilized government to condemn and hang innocent men merely to appease popular clamor. The pamphlet is one which should be read by every lover of liberty. No clearer or more truthful account of this crowning infamy of the government of Illinois was ever written. A limited number of copies of this pamphlet, bound together with Governor Altgeld's masterly statement of his reasons for pardoning Schwab, Fielden and Neebe, have been secured by the publisher of Lucifer and will be sold, while they last, for the nominal price of 25 cents. These two valuable papers are well worth preserving and, as it is doubtful if they will be reprinted, the price is likely to advance in a short time when the number of copies available becomes more scarce.

Persons who desire a clear exposition of the views of those students of political economy who style themselves "libertarians," "individualists" or "philosophical anarchists," should read "Voluntary Socialism," a well written book from the pen and brain of Francis D. Tandy. Mr. Tandy starts his book, like the bible, way back at the "beginning." Starting with the cosmic dust, he briefly and succinctly reviews the evolutionary theory of the formation of the universe. Following this line he takes up the evolution of society and shows that the natural tendency of evolution is toward freedom. He reviews the functions of the state and shows their transitory character and their lack of accord with the principles of justice. He clearly demonstrates the truth of Proudhon's epigrammatic saying that "Liberty is the mother, not the daughter, of order." The money question, police regulation and other functions now monopolized by the government are discussed and the evil effect of the monopoly clearly set forth. With the possible exception of Benjamin R. Tucker's "Instead of a Book," it is this writer's opinion that no single book can give the reader a better and clearer idea of the principles of individualism than Mr. Tandy's "Voluntary Socialism." Price, bound in paper, 50 cents. For sale at Lucifer office.

The Higher Law.

BY GEORGE H. VAN HISE.

There are laws above and beyond the laws of man. In every instance where the laws of man have been enforced in a way to pervert the laws of nature they have proved detrimental to the human race. The marriage law, as well as nine-tenths of all other man made laws, pervert the laws of nature.

Brother Green says, "it seems 'most impossible to get a free lover to set forth plainly what his views are on the marriage question," and that "Brother Harman has that defect." In almost the next breath he says that Mr. Harman's opinion seems to be about this: "That there should be no marriage laws whatever." So it seems, after all, that he made out to understand what Brother Harman meant. I think no plainer language could be used to tell the belief of a free lover. This belief seems something terrible to one whose mind is still in the old and narrow groove.

But what will be the result? Simply that men and women would meet, would love and experience the joys and blessings of love the same as they do in marriage, but would not make vows which they have no power to keep. Holy horror may overspread the face of many people on hearing the words "free love," but all the laws that have been made by man, since the mythical Adam wandered under the boughs of the tree of knowledge, cannot bind love. Love always has been and always will be free. Love is something beyond our control. When one makes a vow to place love in the possession of a certain individual for life he is making a vow which he has no power to keep. One does not have to study married people very long to discover that this is true. Our uncounted thousands of divorce cases are witnesses of this; while countless thousands more live their lives together without love, rearing children under conditions that make them mill-stones about the neck of progress.

To minds still enslaved by superstition frequency of divorce seems a deplorable state of affairs, but facts are stubborn things, and we must deal with conditions as we find them, not as we would have them. When we study the matter we see it is not such a terrible thing, after all, that one should live a natural life. But it is a terrible thing for human beings to be bound together for life when nature decrees that they cannot love for life.

It is a well known fact that the majority of people are so constituted by nature that love for a particular person will not last for life, and when human law keeps people bound together who do not love, then, through the never failing operation of cause and effect, health is destroyed, happiness lost, and their posterity weakened and depraved, both physically and mentally.

Brother Green says that he would protect and improve the marriage law; but while he makes the complaint that it is hard to find out what a free lover believes he fails to tell us in what way he would improve marriage. He also says that marriage is the most sacred contract that human beings can enter into; but fails to tell why it is sacred. I wonder if it is because it has been the means of enslaving woman through all the ages. Or is it sacred for the same reason that two sticks placed cross-ways of each other, are sacred,—because the priests have said so!

When two persons enter into a contract on which depends the health and happiness of themselves and also the health and happiness of the coming generation it is certainly a contract of great importance, but where the sacredness comes in I fail to see. Nor do I see why it is that if this couple discover that they have made a mistake they should not be allowed to correct their mistake, instead of continuing to live a life of misery to themselves, and bringing into the world children with weakened constitutions and morbid dispositions because of lack of love between the parents.

Brother Green would improve marriage, and by these words admits that it needs improvement. Why did he not go on and tell us how he would improve marriage so that love would last for a life time? Why not tell us how to improve it so that people who are bound together by such ties would live happy, healthy lives? Why not tell us how to improve it so that children born of such unions would have joyous, healthy and happy dispositions?

He says he would teach them in school; why not tell us how to teach a child (that, through the curse of marriage laws has inherited a fickle disposition) to love for a life-time? Why not tell us how to train this child so that the bonds would not be galling after love had departed? Why leave us in the dark in regard to all these questions when he knows that we free lovers are hungry for such knowledge?

Brother Green's greatest objection to free love, summed up in a few words, seems to be, as I have heard others express it, that "we would then live like cattle"! This objection is untrue as to fact, but for argument's sake, let us admit that it is true. Living like cattle would be a grand improvement upon what we have today, for cattle live more healthful and natural lives sexually than does the average human. The average life of a prostitute is five years; thousands of these go to premature graves every year, and thousands who have entered married life go to premature graves because of sex-association when love and natural inclination have departed. Did you ever hear of cattle dying from this cause?

Man regards himself as wiser than cattle, but he works harder for a living than does any animal on earth, except the domestic brutes he presses into his service to do his work. He does more to destroy his health and weaken his race than do all other animals combined. He does more foolish things and wastes more energy than do other animals. He does more to destroy his own happiness, and tramples under foot more of nature's laws than do all other animals combined. Other animals will not repeat acts that they discover are injurious to their happiness and comfort, but man clings to the rule of priest-craft though it sweeps millions of wrecked lives to untimely graves.

But free lovers would not be like cattle. Cattle have little or no choice in regard to sex-associations, and under present conditions, through man-made laws, people are prevented from having such relations with those of their choice. Then when their passions overmaster their reason they take the first that comes in their way, and so under present conditions live like cattle to a certain extent. They accept the degrading characteristics but reject the virtues of cattle.

Under free love the only bonds would be those of love, which are nature's only bonds to draw people together sexually. When love disappears, they would no longer be bound. Under present conditions they are bound by artificial law. Is artificial law more capable of deciding when a couple are unfit to live together than are the parties themselves?—more capable of deciding when love and happiness have disappeared? more capable of deciding when the bonds become unbearable? more capable of deciding when association is destructive to health and to life? more capable of deciding when the couple should separate—than are the parties most nearly concerned?

Brother Green objects to men and women being free. Men and women are born free,—or would be if it were not for the enslaving tendencies of bad heredity—and no man or set of men have any right to take away that freedom. Freedom, personal liberty, only ceases where injury to others begins. No one man has the right to control another so long as that other does not invade the rights of his fellow man or fellow beasts; for beasts have natural rights as well as men.

If a man wishes to destroy his health by eating, by drinking or in any other way, he has a perfect right to do so, but after destroying his health he has no right to transmit his diseased and weakened constitution to posterity. To do this is to invade the rights of others; for it is the natural right of all children to be born healthy and strong, both physically and mentally, and this inheritance cannot be assured under our present marriage laws, simply because they pervert nature, and when nature is perverted injury to the race is the inevitable result.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Jas. A. Kimble, Vestal, N. Y.:—I think Green made a great mistake in his remarks on the Putnam-Collins accident.

Harry Hoover, Alleghany City, Pa.:—Green means well and is doing a good work, but on some questions, "Sexual Ethics" for instance, he is far "behind the light-house." He does not understand you, or your philosophy, and it looks as though he did not want to.

Ernest Winne, New York:—I have carefully read both your article and Mr. Green's. I can find nothing whatever in your article or comments to criticise and think them very true, clear and pure, while Mr. Green's article, from a professed free thought teacher, is astounding in its stupidity, if there be no more unworthy cause for its publication.

N. C. Mathers, Wichita, Kan.:—We were well pleased with your "A Free Man's Creed," and were no more surprised at Green's refusal or failure to reply than we are at Talmage's failure in attempting to refute Ingersoll's logic. I must say that I consider Green's logic on the marriage question very much on the Talmagian or Sara Jones order. It was very strongly tainted with very weak misrepresentation.

Etta Semple, Ottawa, Kan.:—H. L. Green has made an —— of himself in more ways than one. First, he said in an editorial referring to the death of Mr. Putnam and Miss Collins, "when they [the bodies] fell from the bed or how no one knows," then in the same editorial: "both bodies were fully clothed when found," and "the clothes on the bed had not been disturbed." Now this is as self-contradictory as the Bible. . . . I hold that all reformers should go on in their own way. H. L. Green, Moore of the "Blue Grass Blade," Shaw of Waco, and Moses Harman all agree that there is room and great need of radical reform work, on all lines; then let each go on in his own way, and all should let the others alone. I dislike to see a fight in our own ranks. As far as I have been able to learn, Green has not "boosted" himself up one inch by his attack on a dead man and a dead girl. I think the article "A Free Man's Creed" the best you have ever written.

THE UNREVEALED RELIGION.

An address of great depth, strength, and beauty. By the veteran, J. K. Ingalls.

"The rainbow is not less beautiful and wonderful to me than to Noah, or to the aborigines, because I understand something of optics and the refraction of light. The rose is not less attractive because botany has taught us to analyze and classify it. The Good of Truth, whether we worship it as an entity or as a personality, or conceive of it as impersonal, is an ever-living and persistent principle man can never cease to revere and admire. And his growth in knowledge and progress in all things refining and elevating to his nature will be promoted, not retarded, by the true but unrevealed, and as yet unloved religion 'The Religion of Progress'."

LOVE, MARRIAGE, AND DIVORCE

And the Sovereignty of the Individual.

A Discussion between Henry James, Horace Greely, and Stephen Pearl Andrews. There are here included the final replies of Mr. Andrews, refused by the New York Tribune, and a subsequent discussion, occurring twenty years later, between Mr. James and Mr. Andrews.

"The great lesson for the world to learn is that HUMAN BEINGS DO NOT NEED TO BE TAKEN CARE OF. What they do need is such conditions of justice and freedom and friendly co-operation that they can take care of themselves. Provided for by another, and subject to his will as the return tribute, they pine, and sicken, and die. This is true equally of women as of men; as true of wives as it is of vassals or serfs. Our whole existing marital system is the house of bondage and the slaughter-house of the female sex. Whether the evils are inherent or incidental, whether they belong to the essence or the administration of the institution, whether they are remediable without or only by means of revolution, are the questions that now have to be discussed."

What Causes Crime?

BY JAMES S. BENSON.

A New York paper has been discussing the problem of increasing crime among women. It has obtained the opinions of several amateur criminologists and of some studious investigators of social conditions. As a rule, the amateur rides his or her hobby. For instance, Mrs. Elizabeth Grannis thinks that the passage of her bill for the punishment of adultery in New York will in some mysterious way check the increase in the numbers of criminal women. She argues that if the wife can get her husband sent to prison instead of securing a divorce from him not so many women will commit crimes. The logic is luminous as soft-coal smoke. But suppose the wife is the offender and her husband has her sent to prison instead of getting a divorce from her, as he might do under the present laws—will not there then be an increase of one in the number of criminal women? In other words, will not crime increase in the same ratio that the law multiplies criminal offenses? To illustrate: The paper mentioned gives a list of women accused within the last few weeks of crime. Twenty women are named, and the "crime" of two of these was suicide and of two others, attempted suicide! One consideration seems to be forgotten by most who write upon this question, and that is this: As woman's "sphere" enlarges, as her opportunities to do good work increase, as she more and more touches the world of activities, she is at the same time and in a relatively progressive degree made the actual equal of man, destructively as well as constructively. We must all understand that responsibility does not necessarily imply strength to bear the burdens imposed, in woman any more than in man. Nor is this an argument in favor of irresponsibility, inactivity and submission. Strength comes by use, and it is better for the race that woman be self-dependent, even if more criminal, than that she be dependent on man and less criminal. If this is not so, then all the pleas for the liberty and responsibility of men are fallacious.

To return to the newspaper symposium: Dr. Robert Safford Newton, formerly chief medical examiner for the district-attorney's office, has this to say on the subject:

Criminology teaches that the habitual criminal is alike irresponsible and incurable; that he transmits the criminal sense to his progeny, and that the only method of treatment in his case calculated to insure the welfare of society is to treat him as incurably insane. Where such a man or woman has children they should be cared for in the scientific way best calculated to control and in time eradicate the criminal tendency.

If our legislators and jurists will only deal with the habitual criminal so as to set him apart permanently from society in an insane asylum, where he properly belongs, then we can hope for a steady decrease in crime.

Against this view of the criminal and of crime is to be set that of Prof. Arthur McDonald, as stated in a late report on criminological investigations, which he made to the State Department at Washington:

There can be no rational treatment of crime until causes are investigated. I am strongly opposed to the theory that crime is a disease, in a medical sense. Fully 82 per cent of criminals are in good health. Nine-tenths of crime is due to bad social conditions, particularly among women, which, once removed, would permit the mind to turn to more wholesome channels.

It seems to me that Prof. McDonald is nearer right than is Dr. Newton. No doubt there is a small percentage of hereditary criminals, men and women who are instinctively anti-social, so to speak, but their numbers would gradually decrease under conditions of sexual and industrial liberty. It is also to be remembered that the way in which we now treat the criminal is one calculated to keep him a criminal to the day of his death.

Some Notes on the Policy of Exclusion.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

The Oregon Secular Union, at its last convention, adopted an amendment to its by-laws providing that "no lecturer or teacher shall be granted a certificate who is an habitual user of intoxicating liquors or tobacco, or who advocates free love, libertinage, a future life, or any other principles, superstitions, or doctrines which are detrimental to our members, our homes, or our state, and contrary to the teachings of Secularism."

Of this exclusion policy George Macdonald, in the "Truth Seeker" of March 13 says:

"I note that Mr. J. E. Hosmer, who is the editor of the 'Torch of Reason,' and who appears to speak for the Oregon State Secular Union, finds it necessary at the present time to inaugurate a policy of exclusion on behalf of that society. Mr. Hosmer thinks that the time has come when the free lover must be drummed out of the Secular camp. Thereby hangs a doubt. Admitting the free lover to be an offensive person, he is of this world, and Secularism, from its derivation, includes him. I am myself behind the age in the matter of social progress, but I have known several professed free lovers, and from my observation of the male of that species, I find him practically indistinguishable from the common married man, except that he may be a trifle politer to his female and rather more conceited about his young. He is inclined to think that his reform is the overshadowing problem of the day, but he dissipates some of his energy in other directions. He is pretty sure to be a woman suffragist; a hygienist, warring on alcohol and narcotics; a labor and financial reformer, and so forth. Naturally he indorses the eighth Demand of Liberalism. So the question arises whether his sentiments regarding marriage should render him ineligible for membership in an organization of Freethinkers. It is a matter of policy, of course. When a number of persons like the group in Oregon found a Secular society and devote their time and talents to maintaining and enlarging it, I am in favor of allowing them uncensured to make their own rules as long as they keep the main issue to the front. Mr. Hosmer is on the ground; although a lying publication has deceived him with regard to the situation elsewhere, he doubtless knows the character of the material he has to work with there, and what stone he may reject without fear that later on he will find the same has "become the head of the corner." Still my ideal of a Liberal society would be one with an ethical code somewhat like Whitman's:

Not till the sun excludes you do I exclude you."

And again, in the "Truth Seeker" of May 15, Mr. Macdonald observes that "The first objector to the Oregon Ethical Basis excluding the advocates of tobacco, free love, a future life and allied errors of doctrine is a Spiritualist. In the 'Torch of Reason' Mr. C. S. Harnish protests against this 'juvenile attempt to narrow Liberalism down to a certain groove of pet ideas.' The reply of Editor Hosmer is of course complete. He says: 'A Spiritualist may be an Infidel, but he cannot be a Secularist; for 'secular' means pertaining to things of this life, and Spiritualism teaches about things pertaining to another life.' . . . . Now that the Spiritualists are permanently cut off as joint-heirs, with other Infidels, of the promise of Secularism, I expect to see Mr. Hosmer tackle the free lovers and turn them down by demonstrating that the things they teach have no part in the doctrine of one world at a time."

I gather from the "Torch of Reason," that as yet no lecturers have qualified, but "applications for diplomas are coming in" and they "will soon have workers of the right sort in the field."

The question of construction now arises: What is a "habitual" drinker or smoker? Where is the line drawn between occasional and habitual use of stimulants and narcotics? And to "advocate free love" must one proclaim it from the lecture platform? Or is the quiet attention to his own affairs while refraining from meddling with the affairs of others, which we recommend, proof of belief in social freedom?

"The adoption of our ethical basis gives our lecturers a recommendation that is worth having for now they . . . must be of good moral character and free from bad habits," the "Torch" proceeds to say." Perhaps. But the ground which they have taken may prove to be an excellent breeding place for hypocrites, instead. I know little of the personnel of the Oregon Secular movement. I am personally acquainted with but one of its officers,—the President—but if he indorses this ruling, he has either changed his personal habits since last November, or is a hypocrite. I hope the latter conclusion is not true, for he is a brilliant young man, an excellent worker, and it would be sad indeed if in the effort to pose as a moral example he must lose his real moral integrity, his self-respecting manhood. There are few people who have a more intense personal dislike for liquor and tobacco than that which I feel; but I would rather see a friend of mine form the habit of using either, than to become the slave of hypocrisy.

Of a well known Freethought lecturer who contemplates a western trip, the "Torch" says: "We feel sure that he will do a vast amount of good to the cause and it is with pleasure that we announce his coming," and then proceeds to "urgently request" societies to arrange for the lecturer and "give him a splendid reception and keep him here if we can." This speaker however does not claim to be a total abstainer and while he opposes "free love," yet he is no more immune from gossip about his private life than are some others.

Does the fact that a man drinks or smokes render his written as well as his spoken words worthless? If not, why not? It would seem that the "Torch" would answer in the negative, however, as it is publishing as a serial Putnam's "Golden Throne," and lists under the heading of "Good Books" Chavannes' "Vital Force."

By saying that these four speakers and writers drink, I do not mean to assert that they are or were drunkards. But if the Secular Union and its publication claim to throw out all such workers they should not retain these. They should live up to their pretensions. By this amendment they proclaim to the world: "Behold us! Here you have a bright and shining example of total abstinence, fidelity to the marriage idea, and opposition to theories of a future life!" Therefore, while in my opinion their private lives are not the concern of the public, they by this declaration throw open the doors of their innermost lives and invite inspection and criticism.

I wonder how many members of the Secular Union, how many subscribers to the "Torch of Reason," would be left to them if all who use tobacco or liquor, all who sympathize with free love, all who believe in a future life, should withdraw their support? Very few, probably. This reminds me of the case of the "Free Thought Magazine." In the April number Mr. Green says: "Of course Brother Harman, knowing that he was writing his article for a publication read by people who take no stock in his free love views, has dressed them up in as attractive a garb as possible." I do not know about the views of the readers of the magazine, but I do know that a large proportion of the writers for it are supporters of Lucifer. Not an issue of the magazine appears without its quota of Lucifer writers, and in that very issue there were four articles, including the two leading articles, by subscribers and contributors to Lucifer. It is well for the "Free Thought Magazine" that Lucifer's friends do not put in practice the policy of exclusion advocated by Mr. Green.

Fortunately the phases of so-called Freethought which we have been examining belong to the rear guard of the movement. These men are perhaps doing good in helping some out of the more orthodox churches. They can, however, have no influence on the more advanced church people, because in reality far behind many of them. As an instance take Dr. Frank Crane of the Trinity Methodist Church, (Chicago.) He is reported to have said that if he could have his way he would admit to membership all who wished to join, regardless of religious, intellectual or moral differences. I have heard him twice at his church and once at the Society of Anthropology—a very radical society of this city, composed almost entirely of Freethinkers. He is courteous and tolerant and does not fear to hear or read the other side. Neither does he appear to consider his moral vesture of so flimsy material that contact with persons of different views of morality must inevitably divest him of it. On one occasion when I heard him talk he said in reply to a mother who had asked him to talk to her daughter about riding the bicycle on Sunday: "That is no part of my business as pastor of Trinity Methodist church. There is too much of this miserable, petty, namby-pambyish, Miss Nancyish, meddling with other peoples' business,"—and much more to the same effect. A man who can talk good common sense, who can give helpful suggestions and tell people to attend to their own business and leave that of their neighbors alone, must be an impelling force liberty-ward, notwithstanding any religious name by which he may label himself. On the contrary, no matter how great the tribute of lip-service self-styled "Freethinkers" pay to mental liberty, their work is practically in the interest of retrogression when they deny the right of all others to think and act freely in conformity with that thought.

Unfortunately the logic of the Christian church is against the Dr. Cranes. Fortunately the logic of Freethought is against the Hosmers and Greens.

The Quintessence of Malthusianism.

BY R. B. KERR.

Several writers in Lucifer have lately been trying to prove that the Malthusian theory is all nonsense, because the means of subsistence would be greatly increased if the land and other natural resources were freed from the grasp of monopolists. Those who think they are exploding the doctrine of Malthus when they mention this fact evidently do not know what his doctrine is.

The principle of population, as laid down by Malthus, is that, in any given circumstances, population will tend to outrun the means of subsistence unless it is prevented either by positive or by preventive checks. He did not say that the earth had reached its full productivity. He did not deny that the productivity of the earth might be immensely increased by inventions or social improvements. He only said that, however great these improvements might be, a time must sooner or later be reached when population, if not regulated by human foresight, would press upon the means of subsistence.

Surely this is self-evident. The earth is absolutely limited in size. The power of reproduction is such that the average pair of parents is capable of producing considerably more than two children. If all parents exercise to the full their reproductive power, and if no considerable proportion of the children die of starvation, disease, or war, each generation will be more numerous than the one before. But if the earth is limited, and the number of people on it is always increasing, a time must ultimately be reached when something will stop the increase. If there were nothing to stop it, it is clear that the whole mass of the earth would eventually be used as material for human bodies, and that would stop the increase effectually enough.

I believe, however, that most people see that point, but they say that under good conditions the time when population would outrun the means of subsistence is so far off, that it is not worth while to bother about such a thing at present. On this point hear Charles Darwin, the most eminent member of the Malthusian school.

"There is no exception to the rule that every organic being naturally increases at so high a rate, that, if not destroyed, the earth would soon be covered by the progeny of a single pair. Even slow-breeding man has doubled in twenty-five years, and at this rate, in less than a thousand years, there would literally not be standing room for his progeny. Linnæus has calculated that if an annual plant produced only two seeds—and there is no plant so unproductive as this—and their seedlings next year produced two, and so on, then in twenty years there would be a million plants. The elephant is reckoned the slowest breeder of all known animals, and I have taken some pains to estimate its probable minimum rate of natural increase; it will be safest to assume that it begins breeding when thirty years old, and goes on breeding till ninety years old, bringing forth six young in the interval, and surviving till one hundred years old; if this be so, after a period of from 740 to 750 years there would be nearly nineteen million elephants alive descended from the first pair."

"Slow-breeding man" has several times shown that, in a fertile country and in good social conditions, he can double in twenty-five years. Suppose there were two people in the world, and they began to breed at such a rate that the population would double every twenty-five years, at the end of one thousand years the last generation would number 2,199,020,055,552. Even at the end of 200 years the population would be 256 times as large as at the commencement. Even at the end of one century the population would be sixteen times as large as at the start. With such a rate of increase the benefits of all conceivable inventions and social changes would be swallowed up in no time.

The Darwinian theory of evolution was founded on the law of Malthus, and must stand or fall with it. Darwin spent twenty-two years on his "Origin of Species," and during the whole of that time he made continuous experiments with many different kinds of plants and animals to verify the working of the law. He found that it worked the same in the case of every plant and every animal. The whole scientific world has adopted his conclusions. A few years ago there were still three classes of people who disputed his theory, the Christians, the Socialists and the Anarchists. But the Christians are now almost silenced. A few months ago a clergyman objected to the consecration of the Archbishop of Canterbury because he was a Darwinian, but he only got laughed at for his pains. When things have come to this pass, I think Socialists and Anarchists might as well throw the sponge up, too. Freedom of thought is a good thing, but when it is used to attack such things as the law of gravitation and Malthus' principle of population it becomes too much of a good thing.

The Whipping-Post—A Fable.

BY CYRUS W. COOLRIDGE.

The whipping-post is one of the ancient and most cherished institutions in the land of N. It is said to have been designed by the Ruler of the Universe who in his great mercy and kindness had ordered that slaves shall be whipped three times a day with a long birch rod. For many centuries the whipping-post was accepted as a matter of course. No one questioned the wisdom of God and the utility of whipping. Laws were enacted making it a crime to speak disrespectfully of the whipping-post, a crime punishable by heavy fine and long imprisonment. Slaves were taught to reverence and worship the whipping-post. They were told that the whipping-post was the foundation of society, and that without it men would be no better than wild beasts.

But in the course of time a few of the slaves became impudent enough to murmur against the whipping. They said: "How long shall we submit ourselves to be whipped by our cruel masters? How long shall we suffer in silence and let these masters do with us what they please? Is it not time that we revolt against their cruelty? Is it not time that we should demand our rights? Is it not time that the whipping-post be abolished?

When the majority of the slaves heard these words, they were amazed. They said: "We agree with you that our masters, or at least some of them, are very cruel. To be whipped three times a day is well enough; we have no right to complain against that, for the whipping-post is a divine institution, without which no well-regulated society can exist. But why should they use such ugly whips? The birch rod is not handsome. It should have a silver handle and be ornamented with ribbons."

"But, brother slaves," said the few dissatisfied ones, "this is not our point. A whip with a silver handle is still a whip. It cuts the flesh just a badly as does a plain whip. If we are to be whipped, it does not matter what the whip is made of. But why should we be whipped at all? Who gave our masters the right to whip us? Is it true that the whipping-post is a divine institution? We deny that such is the case; but if whipping in itself is a good thing, why should not all men be whipped? Why should there be masters and slaves? Brother slaves, we have suffered enough. Let us now start an agitation in favor of abolishing the whipping-post. Let us tell our masters that we will not allow them to whip us any longer."

But the majority of the slaves did not agree with such heresy. "No," they said, "it would be ridiculous to make such a demand. Our masters have a right to whip us and that right they received from the Ruler of the Universe. To protest against it would be foolish and wicked. To be sure, our masters must not misuse their right; they must not whip us more than is necessary for our own good, but whip us they must. The abolition of the whipping-post would be a disgrace to our country."

The few dissatisfied slaves find it hard to convince their brother slaves that the whipping-post is unjust and unnecessary, but they do not give up their struggle for freedom and they hope for the best.

☞ WILL Lucifer's friends, whose subscription is now expired, kindly remember the needs of the printer and send us a little "prosperity" to tide us over the dull summer reason? Postage stamps always received on subscription or for books.

The introduction into Lucifer's columns of matters that seem of a personal nature cannot be more regretted by any reader than it is by the editor, but the interests of truth and justice appear often to demand that the acts and words of individual persons be commented upon. The facts pertaining to the untimely demise of Samuel P. Putnam and of May L. Collins seem to be of absorbing interest to multitudes of people, and there is no prospect at present that this interest will soon diminish in intensity. It has always been Lucifer's plan to hear all sides, and if most that has been said on this question has been one-sided it is because space was not asked for by the other side.

"Hilda's Home."

Several persons have written us lately to ask whether the continued story will be published in book form, and if not whether back numbers can be had from the beginning of the serial, and at what price.

To these inquiries to reply,

First. At present the outlook for book form is poor. Lucifer has all the load it can carry without the added expense of stereotyping, etc.

Second. Back numbers can still be had from No. 613, the beginning of the story. Previous to the change of form to the quarto the price for back numbers is one cent each; since the change—or since whole No. 639, the price is two cents per number.

PRICE PER VOLUME.

In answer to inquiries as to what is meant by "Back Volumes" we say that a volume means fifty-two issues, that is, a full year, not six months. The reduced price of fifty cents per volume, of fifty-two numbers, is made as a premium to subscribers—old or new,—for one or more years.

"The Philosopher."

Among recent contributions to reform literature is Vol. I. No. 1 of a monthly publication called by this name, edited and published by Albert Chavannes of Knoxville, Tenn.

Mr. Chavannes has been long and favorably known as a writer of books and as contributor to the columns of radical journals. Of his books we mention, "Vital Force, Magnetic Exchange and Magnetation;" "The Future Commonwealth, or What Samuel Balcom Saw in Socioland;" "In Brighter Climes, or Life in Socioland;" "The Concentration of Wealth, A Study as to its Causes, Results and Remedies."

He has also written and published several pamphlets, the titles of some of which are, "The Law of Happiness; the Law of Individual Control;" "The Law of Exchange and the Law of Environment;" "Heredity, Cross Breeding and Prenatal Influences;" "The Causes of Hard Times;" etc., etc.

And now in the maturity of his years Mr. Chavannes has entered upon the publication of a monthly magazine as the vehicle of his message to the world of thinkers. The first number contains a likeness of the editor and publisher; contains twenty-four pages of reading matter, consisting of "Philosophical Comments;" the first chapter of what will, presumably, be a series of articles on the "Nature of Mind;" "Book Reviews;" "Canvassing the District;" "Like and Unlike," a character "sketch;" a somewhat extended description of the author's works, etc., etc. Price of the magazine fifty cents a year, single copies five cents.

We heartily commend "The Philosopher" to the readers of Lucifer, and hope all will send for at least one copy, believing that those who do this will want to see more of the author's works—both in magazine and in book form.

Some Mistakes of Our Friends.

BY E. C. WALKER.

The Putnam-Collins' controversy will not down. Perhaps this is well—"The agitation of thought is the beginning of wisdom," it is said, and the lamentable tragedy of December will serve a good purpose if it compel the Freethinkers—or even only a few of them—to seriously face the sexual problem. Our comrades are dead and so beyond the reach of the shafts of misapprehension, envy and malice. Let the truth be known concerning what they believed and did, so far as what they believed and did is ascertainable.

Mr. E. C. Reichwald, Secretary of the American Secular Union and Freethought Federation, has issued a four-page leaflet in vindication of the memory of Samuel P. Putnam. Mr. Reichwald is a most estimable man, earnest, courageous, loyal, hard-working, persistent in the cause of Secularism. But, being only human, he can make mistakes, and he has made several in this publication. The first, seemingly only a trifling one, because an error of mere phraseology, is yet important in its way. In the title the dead President of the Federation is spoken of as "The meteoric Putnam." Brilliant S. P. Putnam certainly was, but the most common connotation of the word "meteoric" is a depreciatory one. To be "meteoric" is to be quick-flashing and quick-passing, lacking the qualities of solidity, painstaking industry, conscientious adherence to principle, unflagging zeal in advocacy of a reform under the ban of the majority. Samuel Putnam was not a meteor in the Freethought heavens. From the horizon toward the zenith he swept slowly but none the less surely and with ever-increasing effulgence. To drop the metaphor, he was an indefatigable worker, an unquailing fighter, a "stayer" to the last hour of the day.

I come now to Mr. Reichwald's assertions concerning the opinions held by his chief. The Secretary is justly indignant with the time-servers, cowards and falsifiers who have trifled with the reputation of the dead Secular leader. In many respects his defense is splendid, both in matter and form. But sometimes his blows are delivered wildly, as when he is considering Mr. Putnam's attitude toward the reforms advocated by Lucifer. In a rejected letter to H. L. Green, editor of the "Free Thought Magazine," Mr. Reichwald says: "Your claim that he [Putnam] was an advocate of free love is untrue, and when I deny the charge for our dead hero, I do so advisedly." In support of this most astonishing statement the apologist continues:

> Mr. Putnam, myself and others visited a friend's house in Chicago a few days before he left for Boston, and while there, the subject of free love was brought up and discussed. When called upon for his views, Mr. Putnam, said, in part, that he stood by the Nine Demands of Liberalism; his time was taken up with that; free love agitation had nothing in common with Free-thought propaganda.

Of course it is self-evident that Mr. Putnam spoke here as president of the Secular Union, disclaiming all desire to confuse the principles for which he stood officially with other principles. He undoubtedly would have said the same in regard to anti-prohibition and other libertarian demands to which he was personally unreservedly committed. He believed, as I believe, that each propagandistic and defensive association can do the most effective work when it confines its attention to one issue—unity of purpose and action cannot be secured otherwise. As a member of the Freethought Federation, I have no wish to ask it to take up and carry forward the sexual, economic and political reforms in which I am interested. Mr. Putnam, as a wise worker, knew better than to introduce elements of disruption into the society of which he was the executive officer. As he truly said, his time was occupied with the work of the Federation, that society standing officially for the Demands of Liberalism only. There is nothing in the utterance reported by Mr. Reichwald to indicate that S. P. Putnam was not in sympathy with free love.

As a matter of indisputable fact, Mr. Putnam accepted in theory and applied in his life the principles of social freedom. Well posted free lovers recognized him as a comrade, and he freely fraternized with them. Whenever opportunity presented, in New York and elsewhere, he attended the meetings of the active propagandists and spoke in defense of their and his convictions. As Mr. Reichwald must admit, I am in a position to know whereof I affirm, specifically, and this is equally true regarding other Freethought leaders whom the Secretary might as indiscreetly try to absolve from the charge of sexual heresy. Mr. Reichwald is no doubt aware that the National Secular Society of England long had, if it has not now, two recognized classes of supporters, the Active and the Passive divisions. In the latter were included the men and women who could not afford to be publicly known as Secularists, but who loved the cause and gave to its leaders their private moral support and contributed financially to the treasury of the organization. Necessarily, a similar state of affairs exists in the case of every unpopular reformatory movement, including that represented by this journal. But no alert man or woman need have been in doubt as to the position occupied by Mr. Putnam. For instance, I never heard him make a speech in which he was not careful to say that there should be complete liberty for all men and women. He said this in such a way as to show unmistakably that he had in mind all the interests and activities of human life. Did Mr. Reichwald think his chief was playing with words, or that universal liberty could be so much less than universal that it would exclude the vastly important domain of the affections and passions?

Mr. Reichwald angrily denounces the originators and circulators of the charge that Mr. Putnam and Miss Collins were lovers, in the most intimate sense, and declares that he stands ready to inflict physical punishment upon whoever insinuates aught of scandal in connection with the young Freethought lecturer. Inasmuch as any relations or possible relations of the two persons named were not and are not the concern of outsiders, I sympathize with his indignation, but the thought that maybe they were happy in mutual confidence and love neither disgusts nor shocks me. I do not know what their associations were, and I do not think there is any person who does know. Assuredly, there is no person who has any right to censure, whether they were or were not lovers. The gross superstition that, if they had been all to each other that a man and woman can be, they would thereby have forfeited their purity and nobility, is utterly unworthy of Rationalists. Such a superstition has no basis in nature; it is unreasonable, it is babyish, it is ridiculous. Freethinkers should leave it behind with the other swaddling clothes of intellectual infancy when they step out of the cradle of orthodoxy.

Mr. Reichwald intimates that Miss Collins was a Free-thinker in religion only, while Franklin Steiner, in the same leaflet, more circumstantially seeks to throw doubt on the averment that she indorsed the ideas of the social radicals. The facts seem to be these: While in Kentucky she was under reactionary influences, but even before she left that state on the tour that so sadly ended in Boston, she appears to have turned her attention to the social problem, and from the hour of initiatory investigation her mind developed with remarkable rapidity. She conceived a deep admiration for Lillian Harman and could not say too much in commendation of the latter's act of free motherhood, taking the greatest interest in and manifesting the warmest affection for Virna Winifred. When she reached Chicago, the first place to which she went, after reporting at the office of Secretary Reichwald, was the headquarters of Lucifer. She affiliated at once with the radicals and continued to seek their company while in the city. When, in the course of a report of the proceedings of the Secular Congress, I criticised her address for its extreme length, she rebuked me saying that the friends of Lucifer and its work were too few for them to waste their strength in finding fault with each other. This remark was conclusive, in so far as it showed where she deliberately aligned herself in the battle for liberty. It is probably true that she had not then definitely taken sides for variety as against exclusiveness, the issue being at that dat under advisement in her mind, but it is certain that she stood squarely on the platform of social freedom, of the right of choice, of woman's sovereignty of her own person at all times and under all circumstances. That platform is fundamental, and it is only natural that so painstaking a student and so fearless a reformer as May L. Collins should have early placed herself upon it, careless of the certain misconceptions and animadversions of inchoate "Liberals" of the Green variety. As for us, her nearest comrades, we carry no flag of truce for her maligners nor shiver with shame at mention of her life and death.

Sociologic Lesson. No. XXXX.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

FREE COINAGE. The attempt to evade the law of supply and demand by the free coinage of silver, is by the introduction of a fictitious demand. If the government coins half a dollar's worth of silver into a dollar which it redeems in gold, it is a fictitious demand; just as when a wheat broker buys above the market price for the purpose of raising the price. So long as the government can afford to purchase and to store enough silver to reduce the supply to a level with the price it pays, the experiment will succeed. But finally that silver, hoarded without benefiting anybody excepting the silver producer, will be thrown upon the market, and immediately the price will fall again lower than ever.

Note the process. The miner cannot sell his silver at par abroad; he gets it coined and it passes into the currency. The merchant cannot send it abroad at its face value, and he sends gold abroad and pays his duties with the silver. The government pays out silver for all its expenditures. The amount of silver currency continually increases, and the amount of gold currency relatively diminishes. If, at this stage, the government redeems silver with gold, to preserve their parity, its gold will soon be exhausted; and if not, prices will correspond with the silver standard, and gold will command a premium.

REMARKS.

That free coinage of silver, or free coinage of anything else, would be an "attempt to evade the law of supply and demand," seems a confusion of ideas. If there is a demand for more silver dollars, why should not this demand bring the needed supply? just as the demand for more wheat or more cotton is supposed to stimulate increased production and distribution of wheat and cotton? Under equal freedom for all commodities the objection urged by Mr. Parkhurst would have no meaning, but under the abnormal and invasive rule of monopoly and of "legal tender" privilege there is certainly much of plausibility in what our correspondent says.

To speak of coining a "half dollar's worth of silver into a dollar" provokes the question, "what is a dollar?" By searching the history of the word we find that it means a silver coin weighing about one ounce, and that it was adopted as the standard of value by the people of this country more than a hundred years ago, and that values of other commodities were regulated according to that standard. A further study of the history of money in this country will show, as I verily believe, that the change from silver standard to gold standard has been accomplished by fraud, by deception, by robbery of the debtor classes in the interest of the creditor classes, compared to which all other frauds and robberies, "according to law" or in violation of law, dwindle into insignificance. HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Cora and Norman did not see any of this by play. He had taken her by the hand and led her to a tete-a-tete, and seating himself by her side soon had drawn her into conversation. A group of exotic plants was, by this movement, placed between themselves and the others, and as scarce a word had been spoken they were in ignorance of what had transpired. Lawrence Westcot now raised his eyes to Imelda who had stood during the scene without speaking. She read in that glance a request which he presently put into words.

"Will you favor me with a few moments of your presence?"

Once before he had asked of her that question, the memory of which sent the rich blood in hot waves over her neck and brow. What did it mean? The words she had uttered when in righteous indignation she had swept from his presence now came back to her:

"And until such time do not dare to speak to me!"

Only once before had he "dared" to speak; that was when she so unexpectedly ran into his arms. Then it had not been of his seeking; but now? An anxious look gathered in the sweet brown eyes.

"Will you, please?" he asked.

The tone as well as the words were full of entreaty, so, silently she moved forward a step and bent her head in token of acquiescence. A glad light for a moment lit up his eyes, then stepping to Alice he said:

"You will excuse us? I will try and not keep her long."

A look of wonderment filled her eyes. When had Lawrence ever paid open attention to Imelda? Again the question arose in her mind, "What does, what can it all mean?" But she readily answered, "Certainly, I will excuse you. I shall do very well. I feel so much better now." With a low "Thank you," he turned from her to Imelda whose hand he took and placing it on his arm led her to the open window leading to the veranda, followed by the eyes of the surprised Alice.

Imelda understood, but only the quick indrawing of her breath gave token that the idea of going out into the open air under the starlit heavens had anything unpleasant in it for her. Slight as had been the sound and involuntary the action, Lawrence Westcot had taken note of it. His teeth sank into his lips but otherwise he gave no sign. Down the garden pathway to the fountain's edge whose silvery sparkling waters had witnessed so many and so very different scenes he led her, and then quietly dropped her hand. Stepping back a pace or two he folded his arms and confronted her. For a minute or more he did not speak, although his lips twitched nervously. Was he waiting for her to utter the first words? If so, he was doomed to disappointment for the proud lips did not open.

"Miss Ellwood!"

A slight uplifting of the head, that was all. Whatever he had to say, she would not help him one iota.

"Miss Ellwood, a man does not often find himself placed in a position quite so awkward as that in which I find myself this evening, in having asked you for this interview." He paused a moment ere he went on. "Some two months ago I spoke words to you that tonight I feel ashamed of. I approached you in a manner that was ungentlemanly—unmanly. For the feelings that had crept into my heart I make no excuse. I simply had no control over them. A hot, fierce desire and longing for something that was denied me; a confused comprehension of what that something was, made me unjust——and——cruel to the woman who is so unfortunate as to be my wife. Having through the merest chance overheard a conversation of yours and hers, thereby gathering something of your strange ideas and opinions, but utterly failing to comprehend them, I permitted the passion that had taken possession of me to have full sway. A woman who does not believe in marriage, what would you?

"In my insufferable conceit I supposed I had but to stretch out my covetous hand in order to satisfy the fire of my passion. I was rudely brought to my senses by the reproof of a pure mind and by the righteous scorn of insulted purity. In an instant, almost, I came to understand my mistake and would have given much to have been able to recall my words. But you had dealt my pride an ugly blow. It was not an easy matter to humble myself to the woman who had treated me to well merited scorn. I had hoped time would close the breach and that this painful scene would be spared me. Men of the world are not wont to retract insulting words, especially when defeated in their object. But something besides wounded pride would not let me rest. There is something here,"—touching his breast, "a painful aching void that makes life a mockery, a misery. The unmanly act of that evening is a burden which at times is almost unsupportable. Will you help me remove it? Will you say that you forgive?"

He had spoken in hasty, jerky, broken sentences. In a pleading manner he held out his hand to her. But the girl stood with downcast eyes and did not see it, and the hand fell nerveless to his side.

Slowly she raised the white lids. In the uncertain light of the starlit night he could not see into the depths of the dark eyes, but as he bent closer he thought they were dimmed, and that her voice was slightly vibrating as she now in turn extended to him her hand and simply said:

"I forgive you."

Hastily the hand was grasped and bending over it with the same pleading accent in his voice he said:

"May I?"

"Yes," came in soft accents from the trembling lips. An indescribable sensation stole over her as she felt the pressure of his warm bearded lips upon her hand. A feeling of gladness filled her heart. She felt that the emotion displayed by this man was genuine, and that she knew she might safely trust him. She laid her other hand gently over his that was holding hers and softly spoke:

"It is enough, please. I feel that you have spoken the truth, in recognition of which I feel bound to pay you honor. Let me hereafter see on your face the light of self-contained manhood. I am more than glad to be able to respect you, the father of my two precious charges. Now let us return. Alice was not feeling well and Cora may wonder." His only answer was to again kiss the hand that was still resting in his; then again placing it upon his arm together they retraced their steps to join their friends in the parlor.

As Imelda and Westcot re-entered the drawing room they found Cora and Norman so deeply interested in their conversation that their entrance was not heeded. Cora's cheeks were glowing and her eyes shone like twin stars as the words flowed in a stream from her lips. Alice was sitting quiet and unobserved in the shadow of the aforementioned group of exotic plants, listening to every word that fell from the ruby lips. Cora spoke well. Norman had said but little, but that little to advantage. Adroitly asking a question here and making a remark there he had succeeded in drawing her out and was surprised to find how well informed she was on many subjects of which most young women have absolutely no understanding. Cora had studied to advantage; for with love to teach, it had not been so much a task as a pleasure. It was also a pleasure for her to converse with this refined and handsome gentleman. Until now Owen Hunter had been the only man of that type she had ever come in contact with. It had seemed to her that there was none other. But to her surprise and great pleasure she found that her sister's lover was in every respect the equal of the man who until now had stood out in her life alone.

Just as Imelda and Westcot were entering, the poets, both American and foreign, were being discussed, and Norman felt a little surprise when Cora said that Shelley and Byron were her favorites. In speaking of these he found her most familiar with Byron,—"Queen Mab" being the only production of Shelley's she had as yet read, while he could mention scarce any of Byron's works that she was not familiar with. When asked, which she liked best, she unhesitatingly replied, "Manfred."

"What! that gloomy pessimist, who continually takes you to the very depths of despair, and finally closed so tragically?"

"Yes. I like it because it portrays so truthfully and vividly the heartaches that so often lie hidden beneath the smiling exterior. It lifts the veil and shows the hidden woe. Oh, why must all nature be thus perverted? Why must all the grandest passions thus recoil upon themselves? The story makes me shudder as if I stood upon the brink of a chasm. It chills my very blood, but it has a weird, strange fascination for me. I always return to it and it has done much to stimulate my dormant brain to action. It has taught me a lesson in thought."

The re-entrance of Imelda and Lawrence at this juncture brought the conversation to an end. A hasty glance from Norman showed him that an understanding had been effected. A quick look passed between the two men and a feeling of gladness entered the heart of Norman, for the sake of all concerned. For a short time the conversation became general, then Cora was asked to once more sing for them. After a little hesitation she did so, and the strains of sweet "Annie Laurie" filled the room. No noisy applause greeted her when she had finished, but every head was bowed and some of the eyes were moist. The last lines had been sung with even more pathos than the first, but the fluttering, quavering sound indicated something more than pathos. Cora was fatiguing herself. In an instant Imelda recognized the fact and hastily arising said:

"Not another line. We have been forgetting that you have been ill, and are taxing you beyond your strength. Come, you must retire at once and I will attend you." But Cora shook the brown curly head.

"No! no! I shall not accept your service this evening. You will remain right here, while our friend here, I know, will assist me for this once. Am I right, Alice?"

"Most certainly. Right you are, and as we are two to one, Queen Imelda is overruled. So just consider yourself sent about your business while I shall tuck the covers about this little girl's form." Thus jesting and laughing Alice in triumph bore the tired Cora off to her own domain. At the same time Lawrence also discreetly withdrew. "To indulge in the solace of man," was what he said, to seek the companionship of a cigar; thus leaving the lovers alone. So many weeks had passed since an evening of undisturbed quiet had been theirs that now they had so much to say that the hours sped far into the night ere they finally separated. After Cora and Alice had bidden them good night and Lawrence had withdrawn, Imelda said:

"Look," struggling from his embrace, "what I have got, a long sweet letter from my Margaret, with one inclosed from Wilbur. She says she is getting along much better and faster with her studies than she had at first expected, and she now hopes that in the fall she may begin with her chosen work. Listen to what she says:"

VARIOUS VOICES.

W. C. Abbott, M. D., Chicago:—I am sorry to learn that you are obliged to discontinue the quarterly but do not wonder at it. The financial outlook and the encouragement one gets in publication lines is very poor. Kindly send me a sample of Mr. Walker's new pamphlet "What the Young Should Know." I wish to examine it. Ten cents in stamps enclosed.

R. B. Kerr, New Denver, British Columbia:—I send you herewith a post office order for ten dollars made out to Moses Harman to keep Lucifer from growing thin. Please send Lucifer for a year to inclosed names.

I am very glad to see the remarks of Arthur Baker on "Isabel's Intention," in whole No. 656. It is by no means the first good thing the authoress has written, however, but she excels even more in controversy than in fiction.

A. Andria, Spring Valley, Ill.:—Having received two copies of that brave little paper of yours, I have read it carefully, and I heartily agree with you in your profound science of sexology and sociology opposed to all laws of authority that are the cause of credulity and ignorance. The brightness of Lucifer will clear away superstition and prejudice, and bring motherhood to freedom and felicity. I inclose twenty-five cents; will be able to send more shortly. I want to see you succeed, for you are doing an excellent work for humanity.

Kate Austin, Caplingers Mills, Mo.:—Lucifer came today, and the first thing that attracted my eyes was the article "A Glimpse of the Old Order." In that glimpse Lillian shows a warm, tender sympathy for the helpless, and a hearty contempt for the lack of veracity of the average news reporter. I am certain that that mother had no desire to bring more children into the world, the bringing of which could only wring her heart with pain. The old Hebrew reprobate undoubtedly lied, and it is to be hoped will pass in his checks before he adds any more to the world's misery.

Ana Purkin, Cleveland, Ohio:—I have read "Bar Sinister and Licit Love." The best of the book is the Badcock and Davis letters. These letters speak well, and forcibly, for these gentlemen. I wish all "reformers" were as clear-minded. I have no patience with those who are worried over the "stigma" of illegitimate children. A bright healthy child can well afford to ignore such law-made stigma. Edith Lanchester's picture is spoiled by her puff sleeves. When will women learn how to dress for a picture? I note the dinner, the champagne and the cigarettes. I think a "good habit" league would be of much importance.

B Clavern, Charters Towers, Queensland, Australia:—DEAR MRS. LILLIAN HARMAN: It gave me great pleasure to read

Do these figures correspond with the number printed on the wrapper of your Lucifer? If so your subscription expires with this number. Please renew for another year.

your able article in the "Blue Grass Blade" of Jan. 31, 1897. I am a subscriber to that paper. What you say is rock bottom truth. You are a marvelous woman, and I admire and respect you as such. I read once before an article of yours in the same paper, which came as a surprise to me. It was on free love. I would like to learn more fully your views on that subject. I would therefore ask you to send me Lucifer, for although I see in the "Blade" that you are not the editor of Lucifer yet I presume you write for that paper.

Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Va.:—I have just finished reading "In Brighter Climes," by Albert Chavannes. It is a bright, charming, attractive picture of Life in Socioland. Life as it would be under proper laws, or rules and regulations. Life where all are equals; where all are physically, morally and mentally healthy. A life where all work and all play. A life where monopolists and evil doers cannot exist. Where love is free, but promiscuous sexing is unknown. Temperance in all things is the rule. It is "a novel with a purpose," and few will commence it without reading it to the end and wishing for more. Of good books there are never too many. Bacon says: "Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested." "In Brighter Climes" belongs to the third class.

"The Philosopher." A Monthly Magazine for Progressive People. Albert Chavannes, Editor and Publisher. LOVE, MARRIAGE, AND DIVORCE

And the Sovereignty of the Individual.

A Discussion between Henry James, Horace Greely, and Stephen Pearl Andrews. There are here included the final replies of Mr. Andrews, refused by the New York Tribune, and a subsequent discussion, occurring twenty years later, between Mr. James and Mr. Andrews.

"The great lesson for the world to learn is that HUMAN BEINGS DO NOT EXIST TO BE TAKEN CARE OF. What they do need is such conditions of justice and freedom and friendly co-operation that they can take care of themselves. Provided for by another, and subject to his will as the return tribute, they pine and sicken, and die. This is true equally of women as of men; as true of wives as it is of vassals or serfs. Our whole existing marital system is the house of bondage and the slaughter-house of the female sex. Whether its evils are inherent or incidental, whether they belong to the essence or the administration of the institution, whether they are remediable without or only by means of revolution, are the questions that now have to be discussed."

The Challenge of "The Strange Woman."

BY JAMES F. MORTON, JR.

"Shame!" Dare you, proud madam, to taunt me with shame, as you pass in your splendid array,
And frown on the wretched street wand'rer, who plods on the hot, dusty way?
You are sure of your own cold perfection, as you stand there erect in your pride;
Aye, sure that no man dare condemn you, with God and the world on your side!
You are fair as the bright Aphrodite; men say I am beautiful too.
They fast on my passionate kisses as the fresh morning rose on the dew.
To you they are cold and respectful, but ardent and loving to me;
They show me their strength and their weakness; the false mask is all that you see.
You greet them as honored acquaintance; you spurn me as less than the dust.
You prate of a one-sided virtue; is that what you call being just?
Aye, marvel I shrink not in silence, to think of my sin and my shame!
And kneel not in penitent meekness, in presence of your spotless fame!
True, madam, the wanton defies you the harlot returns scorn for scorn;
Nor pines for the social position your virtues so highly adorn.
We both brought our beauty to market; my sin, if a sin, is your own.
The church was your auction-block, madam; you bow to one keeper alone.
While I—bow to none! My caresses are mine to withhold or bestow.
Crouch you at the feet of your master, his plaything to hide or to show.
But come not again in your splendor, to prate of repentance to me.
The child of the streets is your better; though outcast, at least she is free!

The Logic of Progress—and the Progress of Logic.

BY C. L. JAMES.

In H. L. Green's reply to Moses Harman, he says he will admit that Lucifer's philosophy would do away with prostitution, "in the same manner it would destroy our rum shops to allow everybody to sell liquor without a license or permit." The parallel is not a bad one—in fact it is far too good to analyze here, and infinitely more fruitful than H. L. has any notion. Here then we have it on record that this self-constituted and Grundy-accepted representative of morality in Free Thought, admits Free Love would do away with prostitution, but would rather not! We have brought him to say that marriage plus prostitution is better than doing without either. This is the fruit of a generation's war for Free Love. When I first entered the arena, rather more than twenty-six years ago, I could get no one but a few ready-made free lovers to see that marriage and prostitution were inseparable—a truth which has now penetrated even the cerebral integuments of H. L. Green! The Philistine reply was then, that prostitution and marriage were diametrically opposite—that "whatever was not marriage was prostitution"—that the Free Lovers, not the marriagists, were the real advocates and promoters of prostitution.

It is so easy to make odious anything new, that most inquirers were readily persuaded to believe this—or at least to believe that they believed it. And the enemy were powerfully assisted by traitors in our own ranks—by those who thought they could serve purity and respectability both—by that pernicious class of fence-straddlers and mandarin-wobblers who were so busy abusing variety that, though they professed to hate marriage and prostitution, they could find little time for attacking these! But "we have changed all that." We—the straight-outs and true blues—have whacked away at marriage till not even H. L. Green denies any longer that marriage is in fact the Lust Power, that modification of primordial communism or prostitution, whose existence alone keeps the unmodified kind from being swamped!

We have periodically, as was needed, made the folks who wanted to fight prostitution-marriage and variety both, understand that between such mortal enemies they must accept peace with one and war with the other. And thanks to whatever gods there be, these double-faced critters mostly went over to marriage and prostitution, which relieved us from a heap of trouble watching them! Henceforth, we are fairly entitled—testis H. L. Green,—to assume on all occasions that sympathy for marriage and prostitution, does not mean ignorance of their inseparableness but complacency with both—that it is not an intellectual but a moral aberration. The cranks who imagine marriage can exist without prostitution are no longer worth considering. Even H. L. Green has to admit he knows better. Neither are the mere respectables any account (they never were) because mere respectability, like mere infidelity, is a negation—a nothing—which goes for nothing in any positive controversy.

The mere respectables, though far more numerous than either the radicals or conservatives, are never useful to either. They are the helpless "bone of contention" between such combatants. The elements we have really to contend against are two. First, these people, represented by Green, who prefer marriage and prostitution to absence of both. These are all males. Secondly, those who fall insanely in love with a new flame about once in six months; when they go to raving over affinity and duality, and denouncing variety. These hysterical nymphomaniacs I imagine to be all women. The bull-necked brute and the feather-headedfribble—satyriasis and nymphomania—these are now, as they always were, the body and soul of the Lust-Power, or of marriage and prostitution. But now they appear in their true colors, they have wholly ceased to be formidable.

THE DUNLOP CASE.

The Dunlop case is a mile-stone in the path of Comstockian jurisprudence. For the first time a first class wealthy journal has been prosecuted to imprisonment of the editor; and that uprising of the press which might have been expected, has, so far, failed to materialize. The alleged very bad badness of the "Dispatch's" "Baths" and "Personals" takes nothing from the ominous significance of these facts. It is under some such stalking-horse that governments always affect their encroachments.

For another reason, the Dunlop case falls like the shadow of coming events. It is the first in which a political motive has been suspected. It is not the first, however, to suggest that Comstockism would eventually be used to befoul still more the mire of politics. Years ago, Mr. Chamberlain predicted that a hundred thousand copies of a leading journal would presently be thrown out of the mail just before election on pretense of an indecent advertisement. He sent me a circular with this lugubrious prediction, and I replied that I not only did not care a condemnation, but hoped that would happen soon. It was the thing needed to wake up the journalists of America, whose united censure would kill a thousand Comstock laws. To this cheerful expectation I adhere, notwithstanding the apathy shown in Dunlop's case. The gold syndicate had such absolute control of the press ring during the late campaign that a Bryan paper rich enough to be influential was almost as much an outlaw as a poor Anarchistic sheet. But that maneuver cannot be repeated, while its results will remain to inspire its manipulators with that sacred madness reserved for those the gods would destroy.

In 1898 or 1900 there will be many wealthy silver papers. Then look for the hundred thousand copies thrown out on account of a patent medicine advertisement—and the consequences! In this connection, it is interesting to observe the decided tendency of the dominant party towards a censorship. In New York a proposition to establish one has been made,—and defeated, of course; but it was a feeler. In the last "Cosmopolitan," a regular censorship is advocated—as a mitigation of Comstockian tyranny! The "Cosmopolitan" is quite right. An educated, paid, responsible censor would, in himself, be far better than an ignorant Puritan blackmailer with more than censorial powers—if, indeed, we were obliged to keep either. But the opposition party is pledged, both by its traditions and its situation, to oppose a censorship. To the ready argument "It would be better than what we have now," this party must answer again, "Then we will have that no longer." Thus the Comstock abomination, which both parties have avoided seeing lest they should offend the churches, is being dragged by the logic of events to immolation in the political arena.

What They Think of the Controversy

"The Light of Truth," Columbus, O.:—Amongst the mass of allusions, speculations and conclusions indulged in by the so-called free thought press with reference to the Putnam-Collins tragedy six months ago, there has nothing appeared of a candid, fair and logical order until Moses Harman's article on the subject came out in a late number of Lucifer. Whatever opinions may be held regarding Mr. Harman's position on sexology and the marriage system, no logical mind familiar with the case can fail to realize that he has wiped the Pharisaic prudes completely from the stage of discussion.

There is too much doxy in the free thought movement for good health. It is only a step from condemnation to persecution, and surely there has been enough of the former heaped on poor Putnam since the night he and his fair companion laid down in death, "fully dressed" and the "bed undisturbed."

"Whosoever looketh upon a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart." Judged by this test, in the absence of proof in flagrant delictu, there is not a single writer or editor who has cast aspersions on the character of Mr. Putnam that is not guilty of that which they charge upon him without proof.

H. E. Allen, Berwick, Ill.:—Whenever I see an article attacking Lucifer I always feel like thanking the person making the attack, for I rest assured that the cause of truth will, as a result, be materially strengthened. Some of the most admirable arguments in defense of Lucifer's work have been called out in this manner. And when I see one of these innocents making such an attack I really feel sorry for him. Why, I felt like writing a letter to Mr. Green and offering him my sympathy. What a shock such an encounter must have been to this very orthodox and conservative self-called radical. Poor man! he will be more guarded in the future no doubt.

To me the principles so ably championed and manfully contended for by Moses Harman are as axiomatic as the golden rule. If Mr. Green, claiming to be a liberal, has the audacity to say that woman should be complete master of her own body—should not be the guardian of her children and property,—then I must say that Mr. Green may be an infidel but there can be no doubt that he is a barbarian. I use this term advisedly, for I understand a barbarian to be one who is unwilling to concede to others the liberty he himself enjoys. I recently expressed this opinion of C. C. Moore of the "Blue Grass Blade."

I am sometimes inclined to the belief that infidels are common but true liberals very scarce. In other words, there are many Greens and Moores but mighty few Harmans. If, according to Frederick Adams, "The average voter is an ass," what shall we say of some of our narrow-souled men who set themselves up as teachers but deny woman the rights they themselves would demand were they to exchange places with their wives, mothers and sisters?

"Motherhood in Freedom" should be issued by the government free to every family in the nation. I have faith to believe that our children will have too much common sense to maintain that our present marriage system conduces either to happiness, health or the physical development of the race. Like religion and many other old things it has served a purpose perhaps on the childhood of the race, and should now be laid aside for "perfect freedom and equality of the sexes." I certainly wish Lucifer abundant success in its admirable work.

J. W. Stuart, Brodhead, Wis.:—I have carefully read your criticism of H. L. Green, and have only a word of criticism of your reply to him, and that is when you quote an extract from the Bible and say "Lucifer does not fight the dead." It would not have been out of order for you to have quoted to him the language attributed to Jesus in his conversation with the Sadducees when he is represented as saying "Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush when he calleth the lord, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob: He is not God of the dead, but of the living. For all live unto him." But this would doubtless have been like casting pearls before swine, for H. L. Green is as bigoted as Ingersoll in all matters relating to immortality or continuity of life. While I sympathize with all Freethought ideas, yet the bigotry which stubbornly refuses to "seek acquaintance with the science of living things," and prefers to remain ignorant of facts of deepest import, blind to God's creation; unbelieving in a living law, manifest through endless change; and reverent only to dogmatic teachings; is no more free than the Christian bigots through whose machinations you were deprived of liberty so many months. I most decidedly endorse all you say as to the right of S. P. Putnam and Miss Collins to associate as they should please.

I often think that thinking women of our day, must sympathize with Madam Roland in her exclamation when conducted to the guillotine for execution, "O, Liberty! What crimes are committed in thy name?" Ours is miscalled a "Land of Liberty," but if this be not a land of slavery, what is it? The feminine part of the American people are largely enslaved by the churches and only those who are emancipated from church rule, can realize their enslaved condition. But spiritualism is making continual inroads upon the church domains and more liberty will be taken year by year by the slaves. I shall endeavor to secure other readers of Lucifer as far as possible. H. L. Green in charging you with endeavoring to shirk responsibility by attributing to Lillian Harman the article criticised by him showed a characteristic not to his credit.

In the closing paragraph of the prelude to your article, you have struck the truth in regard to the causes of human action and it is about time that professed freethinkers recognize this fact viz.: that every human action is the result of a cause sufficiently potent to produce that action, that therefore where a sufficient degree of intelligence exists, no inclination to award any blame for any act will be found. And only with such intelligence will be found that charity which covers a multitude of sins. I will endeavor to call the attention of my friends to your offer of pamphlets. With best wishes for the financial prosperity of Lucifer and all who labor for human freedom, I am yours for human emancipation.

Juliet H. Severance, M. D., Galesburg, Ill.:—It seems Brother Green is very much disturbed over your views of principles and persons. Your article in last Lucifer pleased me much. You deal masterly blows in such a sweet spirit. It requires a great growth to treat the stupidity and cupidity of some professed reformers with such a self poise.

I have known Samuel P. Putnam a good many years and never yet heard him in any way identify himself with, or endorse, the views of those who advocate sex freedom. He, like Mr. Green, always seemed to be fearful of being counted a believer in any kind of liberty but religious liberty. He always seemed to me to have about the same degree of policy, or fearfulness of criticism, or belief in secularism unmixed with other issues.

Mr. Green and Mr. Putnam were not mutual admirers, I knew very well; but I think had the circumstances been reversed, and Mr. Green gone where he could not answer back, Putnam would have been the last man to add one smirch to his memory.

Mr. Putnam, with all his faults, did masterly service in the Freethought cause. Mr. Green, with all his intolerance and prejudice, is also doing a good work in his line of action, but it always seems strange to me that a "Freethinker" can be so intolerant of other people's opinions and misrepresent them after having to contend with the same bigotry from others in matters of their own belief.

I remember thirty years ago attending a large Health Convention, mostly physicians. As chairman of the committee on Resolutions I offered the following—"Resolved that slavery in any form, whether to fashion, public opinion, appetite or passion, is detrimental to health, and that freedom in all the relations of life must be secured before mankind can be free from disease and suffering."

A bomb would not have created more commotion, and after a day's discussion and its adoption two of the doctors, a man and wife, took their names off the roll, as they said they did not wish to endorse free love. The man within twenty-four hours came to me with a story of his domestic infelicity.

I never yet knew a case in all my observations where a person was bitter and intolerant of what they call free love with a sneer (as though there could be forced love,) but that they had something in their own lives that they feared would be uncovered. They cry stop thief to attract attention from themselves.

John Stuart Mill wrote wisely when he said, "Marriage is the only form of serfdom now sanctioned by law."

Let all faithful souls work on until this "last form" shall be outgrown.

Lois Waisbrooker, San Francisco, Calif.:—I am sorry my comments on your "Free Man's Creed" were lost, but I saw nothing in that creed to criticise. The point which strikes me most forcibly in connection with the Putnam-Collins tragedy is the utter lack among a large class of Freethinkers of being scientific in the line of sex life. In the "age of consent" discussion carried on in the "Arena" some two years ago, a Kentucky legislator made the statement that sex-desire can be changed into religious emotion; says this is a demonstrated fact.

In view of this fact he urges that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the young girl, yearning for she knows not what, will be perfectly satisfied in the church. In other words, her desire will be transmuted into religious feeling—religious zeal, her sex life being the power that stirs her to action. What an admission is here! Religious emotion unnatural sex-action!

Now to the scientific point: It is a fact that no thinker will dispute that where there is action there is waste—a something is set free which corresponds to the nature of that acted upon. It follows then, when sex-desire is transformed into religious emotion that in the action upon the desire which so transforms it there is set free a fine element, a sex aura, and what becomes of it? Is it not appropriated by those who cause the transformation? I claim that it is, and that right here is the source of church power. She grasps the very roots of life and turns them to her purpose.

It has been demonstrated farther that the finer forces are the most powerful. This is science, and but for the fact that even while they repudiate church authority many Freethinkers hold on to church morality, they could not fail to see it. Sex desire emotionalized with the church as the engine, and the preachers as engineers, carries with it as much more power than in its natural condition as does steam as compared with water, and so long as Freethinkers accept and defend church morality in sex matters all their other efforts against her power and tyranny are in a great measure futile.

Not long since, and not many miles from here a mother and daughter were found dead together from the effects of gas. The mother was an exceptionally good woman, and the daughter was her associate in her good works; but the daughter was subject to fits of depression that amounted to mania—partial derangement,—and the unquestioned verdict in this case was suicide and homicide by the daughter. It is now being whispered about that physicians say had the daughter been a married woman her head would have been all right. In other words, the sex relation would have saved her life. I do not recollect her age, but she was not a young girl. Physicians unite in saying that a large proportion of our insane are so because of lack of, or inharmonious sex-relations. Now what will Mr. Green and his sustainers do or advocate in such cases? Will they work for stronger laws to hold people together who wish to separate, and leave people to die or go insane rather than that they should violate church morality by being natural in spite of church sanction? Such Freethinkers are as cruel as is the orthodox God, as remorseless of human weal, if it come in contact with their prejudices.

Sociologic Lesson. No. XXXXI.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

DISPARITY IN WEALTH. The great disparity in wealth arises largely from the fact that in the same community there are classes who avail themselves to the utmost of nature's assistance, and other classes who do not. If these classes were in different communities, it would be easy to see that the community in which the steam engine and machinery of their own construction did the work, was rightfully prosperous, and that the community endeavoring to subsist without machinery and without tools, could only properly expect the existence of a savage. But when the two classes are mingled together, and especially when the lower class participates in the enjoyment of the refinements produced by the other, it is not surprising that in their ignorance they should covet the possessions of their more fortunate neighbors and envy their position. It is impossible for a man without possessions to do anything which will produce much; and such men do not understand how the existence of wealth opens the way for immensely valuable services. I will take two illustrations.

WE ARE in receipt of a fine pamphlet copy of a beautiful and appropriate oration delivered at the burial of Abbie, wife of Herman Epsen, prominent Freethinkers of Leavenworth, Kansas, by Rabbi Samuel Marks. It is pleasant to note the fraternal relations existing between Freethinkers and Jews. Rabbi Marks, like Rabbi Hirst, of Chicago, seems to be a "progressive" Jew, with a decided leaning to ethical culture, rationalism and the religion of science and humanity.

Still On.

The tendency to run to specialties, special lines, or to what is known as "division of labor"—the necessity of concentration upon one thing at a time in order to achieve success in any field of human endeavor, has had the effect of confining, for the most part, the work of Lucifer to what some critics are pleased to call a small part of the field of humanitarian reform. While Lucifer's platform is all-inclusive—while we stand for "Light against darkness; for Reason against superstition; for Liberty against slavery; for Justice against privilege," we find it simply impossible to carry on the war against all forms of invasion, all forms of superstition, of slavery and of injustice at one and the same time.

The man and the journal that attempts to do this will as surely fail as will he who attempts to achieve success as a merchant, a physician, a lawyer, a painter, a musician, an actor, and an all-around mechanic, at one and the same time. Josh Billings, or some other funny man, said of Franklin Pierce that at home in New Hampshire he counted for something or somebody, but when spread over the whole United States he became "almighty thin,"—or words to that effect, and so likewise we may say of the man who tries to do everything at once; and we may add that the average span of human life is too short for any man to excel in many things by turns.

Seeing the necessity of concentration we have selected that part of the work of reform, or of propaganda, that to some of us seems most important of all, and the part that seems also to be most neglected and shunned—shunned because of its unpopularity and the apparent impossibility of reaching those who most need instruction along the neglected lines.

In the field of economics, and of governmental reforms, there is no lack of workers; no lack of willing listeners or willing readers; no lack of books and papers. The desire for, and the demand for, a change in economic and governmental conditions is well nigh universal; the demand for the abolition of economic slavery, and for freedom of the laborer, is fast becoming popular. Not so the demand for the abolition of Sex Slavery; not so the demand for FREE MOTHERHOOD!

The reform, the propaganda, that shows the evils that spring from enslaved maternity; the evils that inhere in unwelcome motherhood; enforced motherhood; ignorant motherhood—this reform, this propaganda, has, as yet, few advocates, few papers or books; few writers, lecturers, readers or hearers. It is still very, very unpopular.

To some of us this neglected reform, this unpopular propaganda, seems pivotal, seems vital, seems underlying, seems all-inclusive. To our thinking, compared with this underlying, this pivotal reform all other reforms are short-sighted and superficial—are like cutting off branches while the root of the tree of evil remains untouched. To our thinking no substantial progress can be made in economics or in governmental reforms, so long as the mothers of the workers and of the voters are not free! Free—not simply to take part in politics or in economic production and distribution, but free in a vastly more important sense, viz.: free to own their persons! free to choose and to refuse, at all times and under all circumstances, in all matters pertaining to the work that nature has given woman a monopoly of—the building of new human beings.

We believe that Gerald Massey is in the right when he says: "We must begin at the creatory if we are to benefit the race, and woman must rescue and take care of herself and consciously assume all responsibilities of maternity on behalf of the children," and we believe with Col. Ingersoll when he says that "there never will be a nation of great men till there is a nation of free mothers."

After careful study of what free motherhood means some of us have arrived at the conclusion that it means nothing more nor less than the total abolition of man-made marriage. Whether it be sacramental—priest-made—or merely secular—judge-made—or even self-made by the parties themselves, marriage means slavery for womanhood and motherhood. Freedom and marriage are irreconcilable enemies; each is the negation of the other.

From churchmen and church-women, also from those who get their ideas of human government from theologic sources, we have expected nothing but opposition and misrepresentation, since we believe it demonstrable that it is chiefly by their control over the sex of woman, over the maternal functions of woman, that the priesthood has ever been able to hold and perpetuate their power over mankind. Hence we are not disappointed when we hear ourselves held up to the world, by the champions of marriage, as the enemies of morality,—the enemies of all that is pure, true and good in human association. This opposition was naturally to be expected, just as it was to be expected that the silversmiths would oppose Paul and Grace when these attacked the idolatry of the Ephesians. "By is by this craft,"—the making of images—"that we get our wealth," said they. Free motherhood, self-owning mothers, would mean the destruction of the "craft" by which the priest, the judge, the law-carpenter, or legislator, now "get their wealth"—and their power over their dupes.

But while not disappointed in the treatment accorded us by church people we must confess to serious disappointment. We had reason to believe that those who reject theology, those who have outgrown the swaddling clothes of prehistoric and pre-scientific ages, would reject also the morality, the anti-natural the unscientific morality, that is part of the antinatural theologies and unscientific cosmologies. Instead of carrying the logic of Freethought to the realm of the emotional nature, the affectional nature, of women and men, many "infidels," so-called, hold fast to the old marriage code of Paul, of Luther, of Calvin and of Melanchthon, while rejecting their "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost;" their jasper-walled heaven and their fire-and-brimstone hell.

That it is the natural right, the citizen right of these illogical—as we think—Freethinkers, to hold fast to any part of the cult or creed of Christians, will of course not be disputed. Or that it is their right to return to the bosom of the church and get forgiveness for their heresies, no one will dispute, but that they should claim to be the only Freethinkers worthy of the name, and that they should drive out—as is now proposed—from the National Freethought organization, all who do not accept marriage as a finality, or as the only solution of the sex-problem—to this, or against this exhibition of narrowness, of bigotry, of pharisaic exclusiveness some of us beg leave to enter our protest.

For more than a decade of years Lucifer has fought this battle for Free Motherhood—for woman's right to self ownership. Eleven years ago this month, the historic "Markland letter" was first published in our columns, the central thought of which letter is the demand that woman's person should at all times be free from unwelcome intrusion. This demand is an assault upon the citadel of marriage. Abolish man's assumed right of ownership and control over woman's person and you abolish marriage.

The champions of church and state, recognizing that their fundamental institution was assailed, took alarm, and, under pretext of "obscenity," began prosecution in the courts for the suppression of Lucifer—a prosecution that lasted nearly ten years, ending, as we think, in a moral victory for Freedom, and for self-ownership for woman. Nearly all the papers that first sided against us changed their tone and took sides with us, or became silent. Nearly all the officials who at first condemned us admitted the injustice of the prosecution before it was finally ended.

And now, strange to say, the opposition to Lucifer's demand for the abolition of marriage and for the inauguration of Freedom in the domain of the affections, comes chiefly from our own "household of faith," or from those who profess Free thought principles. Chief among these opponents is "The Free Thought Magazine," published and edited by H. L. Green, who has been prominent in Freethought work for many years. Mr. Green calls Lucifer "the organ of the free lovers of this country," and in the same January issue of his magazine, speaks of "this damnable doctrine of free love," the "curse of free love," etc., and in his March issue he says he thinks the opinions of Lucifer's editor "more pernicious than those of our orthodox friends."

In accord with this opinion that Lucifer's work is "more pernicious," more injurious to the best interests of humanity than the doctrines of the orthodox church the "Free Thought Magazine" urges the "real Freethinkers of the country who believe in purity, decency and the marriage institution" to "come together from all parts of the country and organize a great Freethinker's association that shall, by its character and high aims and purposes command the respect and admiration of the respectable people of this country."

The Oregon Secular Union, the organ of which is the "Torch of Reason" published at Silverton, appears to join Mr. Green in this movement, by an amendment to its by-laws excluding from its lecture platforms all "who advocate free love."

And thus we see that the battle for freedom is still on—on, not simply with the champions of church and state authority, but also with the wing of the Freethought army who still cling to church-state morality in the most important of all human relations—that of sex. In his March issue Mr. Green publishes a long list of endorsements of his course in championing marriage against the advocates of Sex-Freedom. Hence it is seen that our defensive fight is not simply against the attacks of one man but of a large section of those who call themselves Freethinkers.

The "Boston tragedy" receives its chief significance on account of the attempts made to bring disgrace upon the sex freedom movement by the advocates of marriage, by alleging that "free love and whiskey" was the cause of the death of S. P. Putnam and May L. Collins. It is hoped that the defenders of sex freedom, in this discussion, will show the superiority of the "faith that is in them" by a temperate use of personalities and by an exhibition of the spirit of fairness, of justice and of forbearance towards those who unjustly assail and misrepresent us.

Who is to Blame?

BY JAMES RUSSELL PRICE, M. D., PH. D.

Having inherited a tendency to cause-finding instead of fault-finding I have naturally come to consider a cause for every effect.

In my early days, like many others, I made a job-lot of many effects and divided the honors between God and the devil. This is a very great convenience when one has no time or talent to investigate. "Dispensation of Providence" causes so many deaths, etc. How good it is of a great supreme ruler, to father all these epithets without a murmur.

Now I am going to look into the cause of hatred and disgust between husbands and wives which so often leads to divorce or "hell in the household."

Theories are useless unless provable; so in order to make this argument convincing let us take a carefully gathered list of young married women seeking separation as they term it from a "brutal husband." We will let the woman do the testifying, as society seems to make her, to a certain extent, the chattel of the man. We will so consider her in the one hundred cases chosen from wives of ages ranging from fifteen to twenty-eight years. Sixty-eight gave as the primary reason, the treatment received the first night of married life because of the ignorance of the husband.

To illustrate—one case will suffice to make clear what I wish to say; therefore I will use the exact words of an eighteen year old wife who had lived with her husband two years:

"He is worse than a brute."

"Why did you marry such a man?"

"Oh! he was the most loving and attentive man you ever saw, for a whole year before we were married. He came from a highly respected family, was highly educated and I was sure he loved me, for I did love him; but he spoiled all and made me hate him so that nothing under the sun could get me to like him again.

"I was told by some lady friends the day I was to be married, that the first night was just like death staring one in the face. I was fearful and nervous. I begged of my husband not to kill me. He said: 'Now don't be a fool!' I wanted to go back home to my mother. He locked the door. I can never forget or forgive him for his brutality. I wish I could! I have tried for two years. It rankles in my heart; so I have made up my mind that I must get free or I will go crazy."

Modifications of the above will give the experience of sixty-eight per cent. Pride and fear of public notice covers up many cases which are not brought to light.

When there are so many good books on the question, why should such gross ignorance prevail among men?

What an awful, awful condition of things when not one-tenth of one per cent of men know how to love and be loved!

What can you expect in the way of true happiness when not one man in a thousand knows how to love a woman? Better take lessons of wild animals.

As long as sexology is not taught to children in the proper manner and at the proper time just so long shall we have these calamities in wedded life.

The true man and the true woman will grant to each such absolute freedom that the chattel idea will vanish away.

The state and church will be modified just as soon as the rising generation is free from the yoke of bigotry and social tyranny. The desire of the husband to play the part of surgeon on virgin wives, will be replaced by knowing how to gain and retain the love of a wife.

Dianism.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Reproduction is only accomplished at the sacrifice of a portion of individual vitality. The parents freely give of themselves that they may create new lives to happify and bless their own. Through ignorance of sexual law the sex act has been perverted into a mere pleasurable process, or still worse, a form of relief for the male, and too often of passive endurance, to say the least, for the female.

Then aside from all this, comes in various other evil prostituting ways and means of "getting good" out of this terrible waste of vitality, health and moral force. Through all the ages, ways and means have been proposed and tried by which this giant perversion of a natural law might be put an end to.

Male continence, religious chastity (!) priestly celibacy (!) nunneries, etc., etc.; but at last comes the real sovereign and queen, the Goddess Diana, who points a way out of all these innumerable ills, and shows the flower-bordered path of purity, peace and love.

"What!" exclaims the bewildered reader, "only sex for propagation? Only sex a few times during one's whole life? perhaps, not at all? Pshaw! what are you giving us!"

Facts and truths. A sure cure for the ten thousand ills growing out of sexual perversion.

A higher and purer happiness than the world has yet known.

Joyous, healthy father and mother; clean, strong-limbed, robust sons and daughters. So many grand and glorious goods that to enumerate them would be impossible.

Please don't say we have heard all this before; but remember it takes line upon line to indoctrinate people with unwelcome truths.

We do not ask impossibilities. We only ask you to read, think, question and compare.

I hope every Lucifer reader who has (or thinks he has) one argument against Dianism will bring it to the front. A theory that will not stand all that can be said against it is worthless. Opposition is the life of discussion—kind, friendly, honest opposition.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXX.

"MY OWN IMELDA!—To use the expression of gushing school girls, I am just dying to see you. Save my mother and Wilbur, I have no one to whom I can talk just what is in my mind. I have many radical friends here, in dear old Chicago, but none quite far enough advanced to admit them into the innermost recesses of my heart. It is so hard, so very hard, to replace a tried, a trusted friend. In all probability this very circumstance is not without its advantage as thereby I am better able to apply myself to my studies. During the evening hours I have an assistant and it would be natural to suppose that during those hours my studies would progress the most. But, strange to say, we continue to rehearse the same first act—somehow we cannot get beyond it—with some variation, it is true, but id reality the same. I expect after a while we shall surely be perfect. But of what the second contains I am at present not able to give you an idea. It is still a sealed book. To confess the truth however, I care but little, so long as the first act gives such exquisite pleasure. I am perfectly willing to let the second take care of itself. All the same my arms are in the best of trim to give you a good huggirg—a regular bear-hug. Maybe I can impress you. If so, let me know.

"Do you know I almost envy you your present surroundings? You have so many to love now. No, I don't, either. That is not just the right thing to say. Rather, I am glad, O so glad, that you have found that wayward sister of yours, that was. See, darling, how our doctrines have been verified in this case: that we are just what circumstances have made us. Who would have thought that the willful Cora could be transformed into so noble a woman! But then you know love works wonders, and undoubtedly Owen Hunter must be one of nature's noblemen, else the love upon which he fed the starved heart which gave itself into his keeping could never have produced such wonderful results.

"Now, my Imelda, it will be yours to develope the germ which this man has implanted, and when they again meet—which I feel assured they will—he will not find occasion to regret the enforced separation. And now, kiss for me that precious sister pair who so truly belong to us. When your letter came, telling us all about them, describing their persons and characters so minutely that we imagined that they were bodily transplanted into our very midst, Wilbur could not restrain himself. His eyes filled with tears—tears that with overflowing heart I kissed away.

"O my precious friend, will the time ever come when we shall realize some of our dreams, or will fear, like a dark pall, always keep our heaven, our paradise, enshrouded in darkness and gloom? When these thoughts come to me I am sad. But you know I do not approve of that. I shake it off, and indeed I have not much chance or time to indulge in gloomy thoughts, as hard work stands by and keeps my mind busy.

"Jesting aside, my rehearsing is not all play, and my teachers are more than satisfied with me. They have given me the best of hopes that I shall, in the coming fall, be able to fill an engagement of some note. They tell me my talent is remarkable and that I must succeed. Professor Morris has written to the managers of several first class companies and daily expects an answer. Now, my girl, please do not accuse me of what is vulgarly termed "self-conceit," but you cannot know what it means to me to be successful. I love the profession that my talents fit me for, only second to that other object that thrills my whole being. I love, O Imelda, how I love Wilbur, the king of my heart. I love humanity, the down-trodden, and I love the liberty to do and to dare whatever my heart desires. And among those desires by no means the least is my love of the stage, despite the stigma that clings to it. But where so great the stigma as that which has fastened itself to the term 'free love?' or, for that matter, to any other reform?

"Two days later: The answer has come. An engagement has been secured me and—Hurrah! Imelda. In a few more weeks I shall be off on the road to see how easy or how hard it is to win bread and fame. If everything continues as favorable as the beginning appears to be my success is already assured. The vacancy that I am to fill is that of a leading lady, and I know I must strain every effort to please. My mother scarce knows whether she is pleased or sorry. I am sure she is the best mother any girl ever had, and while she is ambitious for me—while she desires to see me successful, her heart cannot conquer all its foolish fears. She fears the men of the world, and the very fact that radical ideas have been nurtured in my mind may bring me danger. But she forgets it also has brought me a knowledge that I could not well have acquired otherwise. I have been taught by object lessons, and I have learned to read character. It will not be an easy matter to try to pass off on me the spurious for the real, the genuine. Wilbur I know trusts me more fully, and why should he not? Does he not know that he is, and always must be, the best love of my heart? Always? Well, until I find some one who has scaled the ladder of life to a grander manhood, to nobler heights, he certainly will stand first, and I know so well such men are rare. He is glad for my sake that I have found an opening, but sad when he remembers that it necessitates a separation. He does not want to show the latter feeling, as he fears to cast a shadow on my glad prospects, but then you know, love is quick to note when every cord is not tuned to harmony.

"As yet I do not know at all where our company will be booked, but I do hope that sometime during the coming season we may stop for a week in Harrisburg. Do you think such a possibility would contain anything pleasurable?

"And now——but no! I was going to tell you another piece of news, but that will be Wilbur's privilege, as he, too, wants to write a few lines. But I really must bring this to a close, or it might prove a task instead of a pleasure to read it. Kiss all those precious friends for me and say something nice to that one particular friend who is not a friend but something so much warmer, and soon, soon send an answer to your home-sick, loving MARGARET."

Folding the closely written sheets Imelda looked up into Norman's eyes and said:

"Well, sweetheart, what have you to say to my Margaret?"

"That she is a precious, sweet girl, and a true woman. I hope that she may indeed be successful in her chosen profession. But what has our friend Wilbur to say?" Without further comment Imelda unfolded another document and began to read:

"MY PRECIOUS FRIEND:—I wonder if, after all that our Margaret girl has written, I shall be able to find something more to say. I am sure she has told you all the news there was to tell and maybe if I should write too lover-like someone would object. How is it? Do you think Norman Carlton would grudge me the kiss which I am craving and longing for? Methinks I read between the lines of the truly grand letters he has been writing us lately, a broadening, a widening out, that was not there at first. I believe him indeed to be a grand, noble nature, possessed of a high type of manhood. I am positive the germ is there, even if yet somewhat hidden and undeveloped, and it behooves you, my little girl, with womanly tact to develope it that he may yet stand in our foremost ranks, working for the universal good of humanity and for the special good of sister woman. I expect when we meet to take by the hand a brother worthy of the name.

"With his natural reverence for womanhood it seems to me it ought not to be a difficult task for him to understand the injustice, the unfairness, aye, the cruelty that is being dealt out to woman; to always doom her brain to slumber, to inactivity; to expect her to stand with idly folded hands, denying her the right to be her own judge pertaining to matters of womanhood; deeming her incapable of understanding her own affairs; dooming her always to submit quietly to what man may wish to impose upon her; using her as a pretty plaything with which to amuse himself in any manner man may see fit. O it is horrible to place woman, the creator, the builder of the race, on a plane so low, and I cannot think that Norman Carlton fails to see these things in their true light.

"It is wrong to seek to bind love in any way, and, try as we may, it cannot be done! Love, the spirit, will ever be free. 'Tis only the body, the house, the casket, that we can fetter and defile, and by that means it, the body, becomes but an empty casket, which will soon fall into decay when it has nothing to sustain it, while the little love-god goes wandering on and on mocking and laughing at our futile attempts to hold him fast.

"Then why should such attempts be made? Cherish him with tenderness, strive to stand high in his regard, strive to attain to a noble manhood and womanhood and he will forget his gypsy habits, his proneness to wander. Feed and nourish him with that of which he is most in need; develope for his especial benefit that in your own character and nature which commands respect and admiration, and you will find him willing to be held in his allegiance. You can do much to win him but you cannot hold him by force, because there is absolutely no holding him. It cannot be done, and it is wrong,—it is a sin and a shame, a crying shame, to attempt it.

"Ha! ha! On the old track again! Always the same; always preaching; but I cannot help it, my dear. It seems to have become my second nature. But now I have a piece of news for you. Margaret did not tell you all.

"When this fair lady-love of mine will have taken to walking her own way I know there will come many weary lonesome hours, for the coming winter; so we have been laying some plans how to make them less irksome. Maybe it is premature to say what these plans are, as much may happen to prevent the realization; but here they are:

"About the time you expect sleighing in your eastern city, I intend, in company with our fair Margaret's mother, to set out on a trip. Do you understand? My heart yearns for those precious sisters of mine, mere babes almost they were when I saw them last. I want to clasp them in my arms and kiss their lips, red with the wine of life; while Mrs. Leland, I know, will win a place in the heart of every one with whom she comes in contact. Yet I believe there is a particular reason that actuates her in making this trip. There is a secret yearning and longing that will not be quieted.

"By writing of the accident which reunited you with your sister you aroused her mother heart by bringing before her mind's eye her son Osmond. The hope to again call her boy her own is the mainspring of the desire to make this visit. How is it, little girl? Shall we be assured a welcome? But there! I ought not to have asked this last question. It was out of place, for of course we shall be welcome. But methinks it is time to close or I will have covered as much paper as Margaret has done, and it is not my desire to weary you. With the same cherishing love as of old, I am as ever

WILBUR WALLACE."

Imelda folded these sheets also and laid them to the others, but Norman did not speak. With his head leaning on his hand he sat staring into vacancy. Imelda gently, tenderly took his head between her hands and bent it back so she could look into the clear blue orbs.

"And what does my Norman think of Wilbur now?"

"That he is right in every instance."

LOVE, MARRIAGE, AND DIVORCE

And the Sovereignty of the Individual.

A Discussion between Henry James, Horace Greely, and Stephen Pearl Andrews. These are here included the final replies of Mr. Andrews, refused by the New York Tribune, and a subsequent discussion, occurring twenty years later, between Mr. James and Mr. Andrews.

"The great lesson for the world to learn is that HUMAN BEINGS DO NOT NEED TO BE TAKEN CARE OF. What they do need is such conditions of justice and freedom and friendly co-operation that they can take care of themselves. Provided for by another, and subject to his will as the return tribute, they pine, and sicken, and die. This is true equality of women as of men; as true of wives as it is of vassals or serfs. Our whole existing marital system is the house of bondage and the slaughter-house of the female sex. Whether the evils are inherent or incidental, whether they belong to the essence or the administration of the institution, whether they are remediable without or only by means of revolution, are the questions that now have to be discussed."

Andromeda.

The smooth-worn coin and threadbare classic phrase
Of Grecian myths that did beguile my youth.
Beguile me not as in the olden days;
I think more grief and beauty dwell with truth.
Andromeda, in fetters by the sea,
Star-pale with anguish till young Perseus came,
Less moves me with her sufferings, than she,
The slim girl figure fettered in dark shame;
That nightly haunts the park there, like a shade,
Trailing her wretchedness from street to street.
See where she passes—neither wife nor maid,
How all mere fiction crumbles at her feet!
Here is woe's self, and not the mask of woe;
A legend's shadow shall not move you so!

From My Point of View.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

Ira P. Holcomb, Jr., asks some very pertinent questions concerning contracepts in his letter published in this issue. For his answer, however I must refer him to Anthony Comstock and the society for the promotion of vice. Mr. Holcomb is evidently unaware of the fact that he is asking us to violate a law of this "land of the free." That law classes prevention of conception with abortion, and imposes a maximum penalty of $5,000 and five years' imprisonment on any one who tells a woman how she may avoid undesired maternity. But this, like many other laws, is made to be enforced against those who have incurred the hatred of the powers that be. Scarcely a daily paper can be found that does not advertise abortionists; while "pennyroyal pills," "tansy pills," and other emmenagogues which are either useless or injurious are advertised in nearly all papers and sold in nearly all drug stores. But if Lucifer should advertise any of the best contracepts that advertisement would be joyfully welcomed as a means of imprisoning the editor and suppressing the paper.

I do not think I can refer Mr. Holcomb to any one book or to any dozen books from which I have deduced my theories concerning child culture. Of course I do not claim that my ideas are original. But ever since I was a little child I have thought and read more on this than on any other subject. To be a good mother was the most intense desire of my life, and I was ever thinking how I would treat my child when I should have one. True, many of my childish fancies were absurd; yet my memory of them helps me to understand child nature. I always read everything I could find on the subject. I have learned more from the works of Dr. Foote than from any other one author. I think his "Science in Story" the best book in its line for the young that I have read. But I dare not enter on this subject in a paragraph. There is so much I want to say that I feel like writing volumes. And yet, after all, I could not say much more than "Thus have I felt; this have I said to my child." And my experience might not be of much value to others. The most important work is to arouse mothers to the necessity of thinking for themselves; of studying the needs of their own children. They should be loving, honest, and true in all dealings with the young spirits which look up to them for guidance through the ever-questioning, trustful child eyes.

BROKEN BLOSSOMS.

Scurrying clouds 'neath a somber sky;
Shadows of night are falling fast;
The northern gale dust-dims the eye,
As I drive my wheel against the blast.

I hear the whirr of a coming car—
Across the bridge the first lights gleam
Of street lamps, from afar and far
Mirrored deep in the murky stream.

Crossing the bridge before me there,
Is a childish form in a draggled gown;
With thin, pale face, and tangled hair,
She wearily walks, with head drooped down.

From ragged shoes peep tired feet;
A bundle she bears on her slender arm;
One hand holds clusters of lilac sweet,
Fading, yet fair in their fragrant charm

"You are tired, Child! Let me walk at your side,
And carry your bundle awhile," I say;
Her eyes in surprize flash open wide,
So we onward pass through the twilight gray.

Her story is simple and quickly told,—
Born in poverty, and early thrown
From a "home" of sorrow, hunger, and cold,
Out with the world to battle alone.

. . . . . .

Our paths diverge, and we say farewell;
Of her treasured blossoms she gives me a spray.
O, fragile flowers! Who can tell—
Who can show us the better way?

O, broken blossoms from Life's fair tree,
Why must you bloom but to fade and die?
Forever must such misery be?
Can we only question,—Why? O, why?

The Legislature of Missouri has passed a law raising the age of consent to twenty-one years. It is to go into effect this month, and is to begin its work of iniquity by condemning to the penitentiary an intelligent young man who, with the woman he loves, believes that the marriage laws are unjust and tyrannical, and refuses to submit to them. So says a report sent out from St. Joseph by the Associated Press on May 27. "Charles Lavalette, son of a wealthy Frenchman, does not believe in marriage. His sweetheart, Emma Mohr, is of the same opinion. They refuse to marry, and the law is having a hard time to make them." The young man is reported to have said: "A woman has more rights when she is not married. I want the woman I love to have all the rights she can have in a country where women are little better than slaves."

Miss Mohr said, in reply to the statement that the law would not recognize her as Mr. Lavalette's wife, that she cared nothing at all about the law and expected to have nothing to do with it. Just so might the lamb say that it wants to have nothing to do with the lion; but the lion of the law has other intentions. The young people have already been imprisoned in jail, and the prosecuting attorney says that unless they are married when the new age-of-consent law goes into effect, he will have the young man sent to the penitentiary. There may be little truth in this newspaper story; but whether true or false it is a vivid illustration of the possibilities of outrage conferred by this law on tyrannical would-be regulators of the conduct of others.

What Shall We Teach OurChildren?

BY NELLIE M. JERAULD.

Teach boys and girls as nearly the same things as possible.

Teach boys that the same code of morals for both sexes is the only just and right way. That what is proper and right for the brothers is proper and right for the sisters, whether it be climbing fences and trees, riding horses bare-back and man-fashion, or any other athletic exercise. That it is prudish and foolish to say, "Don't do that! you are a girl!—now do be a lady!"

Teach the boy that it is the right thing to have his sister go hunting, fishing and boating with him, and that what will make him healthy and strong, erect and manly, will make his sister healthy, strong and womanly.

And above all else teach the brother that if the sister have strong sex desires it is just as natural and right as it is for him; and that it is the same with other boys' sisters, and that a girl does not lower herself from a high standard of morality should she show a decided preference for a certain young man's company, and that she need not wait for him to "sneeze before she coughs"!

Teach the girl that all parts of her body were formed at the same time and each for a special purpose, and that one portion is just as good and honorable as another.

Teach her that she should dress to suit the labor to be performed or the pleasure to be enjoyed. That a long skirt covering the ankles is not the proper garment for tramping through the woods, rowing on the water or riding the wheel, and that it is no disgrace to show the legs even to the knee, if covered with a whole, neat stocking; that if the stocking is untidy, ragged or unclean—that is disgraceful and unwomanly. That the arms, neck, shoulders and legs are nothing of which to be ashamed, and that the time is coming when we will not have to cover every portion of our bodies, except the face, to prove our modesty.

As soon as a boy and girl are old enough to want to know anything regarding themselves they are old enough to be told, and told the truth! Who but a mother should tell the truth to her children? all the truths that are known to the world today? Who can tell it in a better way than the mother? than she who for nine months carried the son or the daughter close to her heart? she who alone can say, "thou art bone of my bone, flesh of my flesh, blood of my blood?" she who had to bear the pain, —oft the agony worse than death, to bring into the world the boys and girls from whom we hope so much in the future?

If we expect our girls to be able to protect themselves from the libertine (not the free lover, for they will need no protection from one who is a free lover from principle) they must be taught the value of love—that they must hold themselves, their persons, as something precious; that they must never cheapen themselves, and must give and take the pleasures of sex only when both will be made happy, and that true love is something pure, deep and holy, something entirely apart and forever separated from lust—something which we all should be glad and happy to own, and not a thing of which we should be ashamed.

Mothers should make companions of both sons and daughters, should teach them that "mother" is always their best friend, always interested in their pleasures, their sorrows, their friendships and their loves. We need not fear that the boys and girls will go far wrong, or that they will wreck their happiness so long as they confide in "mother."

When their love affairs begin to assume tangible shape, teach them that it is a crime to bring human beings into a world that is already overcrowded, unless they are sure they can provide for their offspring. That every child has a right to be born well, and that a girl or woman has no right to bring an unwelcome child into the world. Teach your girl the meaning of heredity; that the pre-natal influence is lasting as life.

Do you shrink, mothers, from all this? Then you are not worthy to have children. Do you plead ignorance? Then study. Until mothers learn to think, and to teach their sons and daughters, it is useless to talk of freedom for the sexes.

The future of the coming generations, whether for weal or or woe, is in the hands of the mothers. When they learn to think, and "to think right," then and not till then will they demand their freedom, and demanding obtain it.

Man is a slave as well as woman; but I will not enlarge—having already made this article longer than at first intended.

Defines His Position.

BY JESSE B. JONES.

In Lucifer dated May 5, in your comments on my article, you ask me some questions. In so far as it seems to me that I can promote the great cause of freeing woman from the dominion of man I will offer such answer as I can.

You would have me tell "what freedom from man's yoke really means for woman," in my mind. I mean the entire freedom of woman in her sex nature from all subjection to man under any circumstances. I mean the annihilation of "marital rights." I mean the ending of any man "having his will of" any woman against her will, or wish. Now no man can lawfully have his will of any woman not his wife. I mean that no man shall lawfully have his will of his wife against her will or wish, any more than of any other woman. I mean the abolition of the dominion of the man over the body of the woman. That dominion is "the yoke of man" which I would have broken 'off from the neck of woman;" and this new abolitionism for women seems to me as clear and plain and important as the abolitionism of Wm. Lloyd Garrison for the negro did sixty years ago. Here is my "substantial agreement" with "Lucifer's central thought," and this is why I see that Lucifer is doing a work that is vital to the welfare of the human race; and I affirm this agreement however much I may differ with Lucifer on other matters.

When the woman is free from the dominion of the man, then there will arise the question, What will she do with herself? and that will raise the question, What is righteousness? On this with its related questions I probably differ from Lucifer so deeply that any attempt at discussion would be ill-advised doing more harm than good.

What seems to me the way of wisdom is to discuss only what we agree upon, considering how to make our agreement effective; and to pass over what we differ about. The experience of the woman whose case I presented was none the less pitiful and deserving of the sympathy of Lucifer's readers, because she is a Methodist Christian, and has religious views with which Lucifer does not agree; and for me to present the case in such language as is natural to me might be allowed without our points of difference being emphasized for debate.

And so with reference to the term "Most High." I cannot see any good to come from a presentation of the meaning of the words, as it arises in my soul. It would just awaken debate,—a war of words where both sides were fixed in their minds at the start; and I believe Lucifer's space can be used to better ends. So from this also may I be excused.

Lucifer asks me to "tell in few words just what he means by the 'true life in sex.'" I have a very clear view of what I mean, as a result of the deepest experience in the interiormost of my life; but it cannot be told in few words, and it is fundamentally different from Lucifer's view, but I think there is no "sex-starvation" in it, or at least if there be, the amount would be too small to require consideration in our time. One fundamental difference is this, that in my view society is greater than the sum of the individuals composing it, and the individual must be subordinated to society; while I understand Lucifer to teach that the individual is supreme, everyone going as he will if he does not directly invade the domain of another.

Growing out of this is the further view on my part that the great matter is to show a better order of society, and help those who have life before them to enter into that better order, enduring with patience, in large measure, what has already befallen, and not trying to mend broken china. To show people how to begin life and live it through without broken china I believe to be the better way. Hence, for illustration, I would diffuse to the utmost a knowledge of the temperaments as the very fountain of love, as one means of showing the way of "true life of sex." But Lucifer differs from me too greatly for co-operation there. We are at one in crying out against the dominion of man over woman, and so on that point we can act together, as Lucifer has done in printing "A Pitiful Experience." I heartily agree with Lucifer that these subjects are the most vitally important of all that relate to human welfare and progress.

Some Experiences and Observations.

BY MATTIE E. HURSEN.

Since writing to Lucifer some weeks ago, I have received several personal letters containing experiences which your readers may perhaps be able to throw light upon, and thereby enlighten others. So I take the liberty to send quotations from some of these letters, believing that no offense will be taken by the writers thereof. A lady writes:

"There was something lacking in my life. For years a longing for something, a vague unrest, a thirst unquenched; till at last I was happy in the love of one of the opposite sex. My whole being was then changed, and the longing satisfied. The centripetal force had drawn us together and I was filled with joy to think I had at last found my soul mate.

"But my life current has been changed. I have lost the love of my husband. The force that brought us together was spent in a few years, and he is gone. My love is as strong as ever but I could not hold him to me. But I do not feel that longing, that unrest, that I felt before I met him. . . . My husband said he did not think it right to live with a woman he did not love; he had thought he loved me but the spell was broken."

Can someone answer me this question: Why was the attraction or force that drew this couple together broken on his part while it remained the same on hers? Also; can these attractions be made lasting through the knowledge of a right use of the sex nature?

Now comes a letter from a friend to whom I sent a bundle of Lucifers, with Lloyd's article marked, which letter seems too good to be wasted on me:

"The papers you sent gave me much food for serious reflection. I have read them all carefully; after which distributed them where I thought they would do the most good. Several who read them opened their eyes at the 'strange doctrines' taught therein. Subjects that had never been thrust upon their notice before, startled them somewhat at first, but upon more mature reflection they were nearly all willing to admit that there was more truth than poetry set forth in Lucifer's pages. The sex question and its side issues not having been brought before the public eye, it is no wonder that so much ignorance prevails in reference thereto, or that so much wrong has been done to woman through sheer ignorance of these matters. If boys were taught the fearful results that self-abuse entails on the mental as well as the physical being I have no doubt that in ninety-nine cases in a hundred they would avoid the impure practice. So it is with the marital question. Thousands of men abuse both themselves and their wives through ignorance. Darkness reigns. Let there be light. With the advent of light darkness flies.

"I was very much interested and pleased with the marked article in which the question of 'side-loves' was considered. It is an unique article, and extremely well written. The author has evidently studied his question with care, and presents his plea with much skill. I agree with him heartily in the position he takes, but I ask, how many will practicalize the ideas set forth? and even if many should, very few are fitted by nature or education to live such a life in practice. Without wishing to be thought egotistical, however, I think that I could put into practice the doctrines he preaches. You know that I love A—— better than any living human being. Now, must I confine all the wealth of my love nature, must I confine all the force of my affection and center the same upon him? No! Banish the 'green-eyed monster' jealousy! Neither do I expect that he should bottle up the wealth of his noble, generous heart to pour it upon my head—or heart. Like every other feeling, love grows by exercise, and the more we give the more we have to give.

"Yes, I think the world would be happier could the ideas of the author [Mr. Lloyd] be carried out. The curse of the world is monotony. One man, one woman, one bed—for, say, fifty years. O dear me! It makes my blood run cold, just to think of it. This demon monotony has caused thousands of murders, millions of divorces, and broken hearts without number.

"The more I study the question of love the more I am constrained to believe in its absolute freedom. Such freedom would banish jealousy, hatred, enmity, law-suits. It would clear the moral atmosphere, and refine and purify the whole nature. It would make us generous toward each other, and would cause the narrow littlenesses of life to disappear.

"How many homes have been wrecked by the monopoly of love by one individual. He or she is 'all mine'—I demand all his love, all his attention, all his person. If he goes out I want to know where. If he stays in I want to know wherefore. If he smiles upon another, or gives a friendly kiss to another I want a divorce. And vice versa. My heart is too large, too full of human love, too full of affection for all mankind, to be able to bottle it up, and make anyone, however good, its sole keeper."

"Occult Science."

From Columbus, Ohio, Light of Truth Publishing Company, we are in receipt of an illustrated quarterly magazine, with the above title. Among the subjects treated of are the following: "Hypnotism; Spiritism; Theosophy; Somnambulism; Ghost Stories; Telepathy; Palmistry; Astrology." In Vol. I. No. II. we find as leading articles, "Hypnotism, Report of work done at the Daily Clinic of the Chicago School of Psychology, by Herbert A. Parkyn, M. D.;" "Spirit Photography—Harry Archer and his Controls;" "Human Voice Photographed;" "A Living Dynamo—Remarkable Power of the girl, Fanny Hester;" "Theosophy—Meaning of its terms—'Reincarnation,' All about 'Auras,' etc.;" "Palmistry," "Obsession," etc., etc. All of these subjects are more or less illustrated by the engraver's art, and include likenesses of more than a dozen people prominent as specialists in the various branches of "Occult Science." Price, ten cents per number, or forty cents per annum.

Whatever we may think of the general subject of "The Occult," the interest of the so-called scientific world in this class of studies is certainly on the increase, and those who would keep posted, at small expense, on what scientific research is doing along these lines cannot do better than send for this quarterly.

Our April Magazine

At last! After much vexatious delay—a part of which delay was the result of a loss which necessitated the resetting of one entire form of sixteen pages—number seven of "Our New Humanity" is now ready for distribution to subscribers.

The table of contents is as follows: "The Rights of Children," by R. B. Kerr; "Incineration," by Walter Breen; "What are Women Here For?" by E. B. Foote, Jr., M. D.; "What the Young Need to Know, A Primer of Sexual Rationalism," by E. C. Walker; "The New Martyrdom," by Lillian Harman; "The Will," From the French of Guy de Maupassant; "A Free Man's Creed," by M. Harman.

To all who have patiently waited for the April number of the magazine we return sincere thanks, and tender our regrets that they were compelled to wait so long. And from all who have paid a year or more ahead we ask still further forbearance. As explained some time ago, in Lucifer, we feel obliged to suspend the publication of "Our New Humanity" until the financial outlook shall be better than it now is. To all who do not wish to wait indefinitely we will send the amount due them in other literature, or refund the money. At present we feel that the publication of Lucifer is all that our straitened finances will now permit us to undertake in the way of weekly or quarterly issue.

Hoping that a brighter day is coming, for us all, we once more ask our friends to send us whatever co-operative aid, in the way of subscriptions or renewals—or for books in our line—that they can, in justice, afford to spare for this line of reformatory work. The fact that so few see the need of education and agitation in regard to the fundamental problems involved in Sexology and Race Culture, make it all the more necessary that those who are awake to such necessity should make special effort to keep alive the one paper that is mainly devoted to such agitation and education.

The Barcelona Horror.

The question is often asked, "Is the world growing better?"—as it grows older, or is it growing worse? Does civilization civilize; does education educate; does Christianity Christianize or humanize, or does it barbarize and demonize?

These and other like questions are daily suggested by observation, and by reading the current news of the world, as it is served up to us by those whose business it is to find out and to record what is being done on the planet of which we are denizens, and of which we are the product—the offspring.

It is commonly asserted, if not currently believed, that the present age, the nineteenth century of the socalled Christian era, is an age of progress, an age of enlightenment, of civilization, of refinement, of culture, of humanity or brotherhood,—as compared with the centuries that have preceded it. That men do not rob, torture and murder each other now, as they did during the "dark ages" of the world's history. We are told that "evolution" is getting in its work, and that the religion of love,—the doctrine of the "fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man," is being taught and heeded, as it never was before. That the doctrine of "human solidarity," or the oneness of the interests of mankind, is being accepted, and more generally acted upon than ever before.

But what are the facts? Is it true that we accept and act upon the doctrine that "an injury to one is the concern of all?" Is it true that people are no longer imprisoned, fined or otherwise robbed, simply for difference of opinion on matters of religion or morals?—as was so common a few hundred years ago.

If people are no longer imprisoned or otherwise persecuted simply for difference of opinion, how comes it that those who do "not believe in marriage," but who strictly attend to their own business and let their neighbors alone, can be deprived of liberty and property, under the marriage laws of Missouri—as noted elsewhere in this issue—and under the laws of nearly every other country that boasts of its "Christian civilization?" Why is it that right here, in Chicago, only a few years ago, men were imprisoned and hung for a mere matter of opinion, no act of invasion whatever being proved against them—the court itself making no such claim?

And now comes a story from Barcelona, Spain,—not Cuba, nor Armenia, nor Crete, nor South Africa—but from Spain, the most intensely Christian of all Christian countries in the world—from the historic Christian city, Barcelona, Spain, comes a story that tells us the "Inquisition" is not dead, nor sleeping. A story that for fiendish barbarity is scarcely equalled in the annals of persecution for opinion sake, in any age or country.

From a pamphlet entitled, "The Modern Inquisition of Spain," we quote:

"On the 7th of June, 1896, a bomb was thrown into a Corpus Christi procession as it passed the Cambios Nuevos street, in Barcelona, Spain. The perpetrator of the outrage was not discovered, and in default of such discovery the Spanish Government proceeded to arrest three hundred persons, the entire membership of the Centro de Carretros (Car Men's Club), composed of persons of various political faiths, including Republicans, Socialists and Anarchists. The method of the prosecution was to make the whole of the membership and attendance of the Car Men's Club responsible for the act of some unknown person or persons who might or might not have belonged to that society.

"For eight months now, one hundred and seventy of these persons have been imprisoned without trial or interrogation; eighty-three have been tried; twelve acquitted, but not set free; nine certainly condemned to death, and the death sentence demanded for twenty-eight; already five have been shot, and the remainder sentenced to imprisonment in terms varying from eight months and one day to twenty years."

From quotations taken from the "Dominicales," a Madrid "Bourgeoise paper,—no Anarchist paper being now permitted to be published in Spain," and from "El Pais," a "Republican paper of Madrid," and from correspondence with the "Frankfurter Zeitung" and with Henry Rochefort's "L'Intransignant," (Paris), the pamphlet presents testimony that tells of tortures inflicted upon the unfortunate victims of prejudice and of judicial brutality, that "out Herod Herod," and out Torquemada Torquemada himself.

To save the sympathetic feelings of Lucifer's readers, the sickening details are omitted, but for those who wish to investigate, that they may intelligently join in the protest that should go up from every land under the sun against such barbarities, we recommend the reading of the pamphlet above named; a copy of which can be had for the postage—one cent, if sent to N. Notkin, 777 South Third street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Ira P. Holcomb, Jr., Dinuba, Calif.:—Two weeks ago when I came home from a two weeks visit in the southern part of the state I found the three books I ordered, also two copies of Lucifer waiting for me. As yet I have not had time to more than sketch the books, "The Old and The New Ideal," "Love, Marriage and Divorce," "When Love is Liberty and Nature Law," but have been very much interested in Lucifer, especially No. 657. After reading the article "What Shall I Say To My Child," by Lillian Harman, I felt that perhaps she had read some books or articles which I have been hunting for, for a long time. I would call it a treatise on the "Genesis of Life." It would give the latest known facts and from which would be deduced theories as to the origin and development of life, especially human life.

Amy Linnett in the article "Continence and Contracepts" says that she has been applied to for the name of some firm dealing in contracepts. I would also ask for the same information. The question that has arisen in my mind is, why has not Lucifer given some good, safe preventative to conception or else given advertisement of the best contracepts?

Arthur E. Clark, Hecla, S. D.:—I don't know what you think of a fellow like me for allowing my subscription to run so far behind and no excuses. Well I will partly atone by sending you draft for two dollars and ask that you set my peg ahead a couple of notches. Well we have McKinley for our president and "things get no better fast." But my opinion is that in this ferment we common people, if we have enough brains to make a decent head ache, will at least hold our own. There is some consolation in the thought that we are where they can't crowd us any more. And with Geo. De Bernardi pointing the way so plain to the solution of the bread and butter problem I feel that most any time the common people will adopt his labor exchange check to carry on our exchanges and the legal tender will go out of fashion, which indeed it already has done, but people don't know it. And to prove this I will give the experience of our little bank from Jan. 1 to May 1 '97. We paid out during this time $39,122.35. We had 3,235.71 on hand when we began, and did not ship in even a dollar. Thinking my cash balance running a little too high, one day when going to the county seat where we keep an account, I took $2,000 merely to get rid of it, which if I had not done my balance May 1 would be cash on hand 2,958.53, or actual decrease in our money on hand while paying out $39,122.35 was only $277.18.

I presume such problems are old to you, but I like to call people's attention to them. These figures are taken from actual banking business and are no exception. And why the common herd can't be taught that they are not using anything but a substitute or as Wayland says, a "bastard money," is the "beatem" [of me. We could have used labor exchange checks for all this business except the $277 as it has all come back and it is not absurd to claim that the $277 will come back during the season.

Albina L. Washburn, Loveland, Colo.:—I do not feel competent to say whether Mr. Putnam and Miss Collins were practically or ideally sexual mates, but do say that they had a right to be, if it pleased them, and it is no affair of mine or of any one not personally connected with the parties and having claims on them. Nor can I imagine any such claims, legal or otherwise which would be valid.

2nd. Having no knowledge of the persons in question, and having little interest in the discussions incident upon the mode of their death I see no reason to disparage the noble work they have done for the cause of freethought, by accusing them of acts which might or might not redound to their credit as free-thinkers and, what is better, free actors in life's drama. I regret that I did not know Mr. Putnam and Miss Collins as I believe it would have been a benefit and pleasure to me. When leisure for quiet thought comes I wish to read their written words and learn of their life labors. I may also add my firm belief that in the light of the fact that "there is no death—what seems so is transition," they are now busy forwarding the work so well begun here in earth life, and possibly are aiding the cause of freedom more effectually than they could have done here.

Brother Harman, I like your treatment of the case and have but one fault to find with you. Bold and independent as you are you still lack a little there. Be not afraid of hurting feelings. Speak the truth as it appears to you plainly, boldly, energetically—though never so lovingly and tenderly, and the sweet arrows of conviction will find their mark.

I think you have too much of that feminine virtue, self-depreciation. This comes from lack of faith in the everlasting ever present good—or god—as manifest for your own special use in yourself. I oblige myself to constantly cultivate the quality of self-respect or self-esteem which I interpret as faith in the "still small voice"—sure to lead us right if we will but listen. And through the door of death we may hear, as it opens at times, the hum of activity on the other side, where, promoted, we take up new studies built upon the old and see yet more clearly the uses of eternal progression and education toward a lasting joy for all humanity.

Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Va.:—I've said almost nothing in print concerning this "sad case," for I was so hurt and shocked by the contumely poured out upon my ideals, that I was too confused and bewildered to know what to think.

For all these months, I've read every side of the "tragedy" in letters and in print, and I must say that Mr. Harman in his summing up in Lucifer No. 20, has given as fair and unbiased a statement as I have yet seen. I object though to one statement or query that "there was no real loss, or ever is, in any of Nature's tragedies."

If loss be a legitimate word, to my mind the world is almost as full of losses as of acquirements.

Cyclones, floods, fires, thefts, murders, etc., etc., are losses. The death of Putnam and May are a loss to the liberal world (in all probability).

If Putnam drank to excess of late years, who shall say he might not have given it up on finding out what a "loss" it was to him, and the good cause?

Several of our presidents have drank to excess. I hear that one of our ex-presidents tried the Keeley cure as soon as his term expired.

As to free love, I took the ground before my marriage (in 1856) that no one could tell how long love would last, and my marriage certificate reads, "we mutually promise to take each other for husband and wife hoping to be faithful and loving companions till the end of life."

For over thirty years I was true to the contract, then Mr. Slenker arrived at one of the "time locks" Helen Gardner speaks of, and became so changed that love died and "ended all,"—as death always does!

One remark as to Van Hise's assertion that "Animals live higher sexual lives than humans do, and . . . they never die from wrong sex-associations." It is true animals cannot rise so high or sink so low as we can, but canary birds have been known to kill a mate by too frequent sexings. Animals will use liquor and tobacco if educated to it. The strong ones keep the weak (males) from sexing, and these will sex where they can, by force if refused by a female. We should not look to animals as guides, but take the highest and best of our own race.

We really know so little of animal life in the wild, free state, and among humans none are free. Birds that hatch eggs of other than their own kind are often killed by their mate or by their kind as having been free sexers!

Even the great Whitman errs where he says, "The continence of vegetables, birds, animals. The consequent meanness of me should I skulk or find myself indecent while birds and animals never once skulk or find themselves indecent." If there be incontinence in a free scattering of sex germs, vegetables, trees and flowers and weeds are the guiltiest of the guilty, for they scatter these in all possible ways and quantities.

Rev. Jesse H. Jones, North Abington, Mass.:—The marked copy [653] of the Lucifer has been read through. I think there is no phase of the subjects dealt with in it but what I have thought out through to the end. If this seems self-assertive please excuse it. I see no other way to say anything; for no one has any right to speak only as they have thought out the whole subject.

From time to time, and in this case, I have much to say, sometimes very much in short sayings; but it is useless for me to prepare anything without the fair assurance that it will be printed, or otherwise effectively used.

For instance in the case which Mattie E. Hursen writes about, beginning at the bottom of page 111, I can see at once that there is an imperfect temperamental harmony, enough harmony for vital children but not enough for completely satisfactory companionship.

The testimony of this woman as to what wives say about the union with their husbands is important. I should say conclusive as showing that a union which produces such results is essential evil, and ought to be renounced and denounced.

The most important element of cure is to teach what those conditions are under which the union is righteous. I think there are some men who would give up any claim on the union with any woman if they knew that it produced such results. I know from what has been said to me by some that there are men who would willingly confine themselves to the union only under conditions of complete reciprocity. Now the teaching of these conditions is essential to the development of any full measure of intelligent righteousness in the ultimate sex relation. The fact is that the real truth in the case is restrictive in its nature; and the more the truth is taught and the true ideal is set before the mind, the more does that ideal awaken in some the desire to rise out of the "beastly" into the righteous and hallowed.

As to your views of marriage in "A Free Man's Creed," I should suppose you would consider that Editor Green dealt by you with complete fairness. Leo Miller and his affinity were in this region in either '77 or '78, and I debated with them in a hall in Rockland, two miles east of here. They took exactly your position as to marriage, and they and I had complete free swing to present our views without restraint. There was an audience of seventy-five or more and everybody felt that a full presentation was made, and I never heard that anybody was inclined to their view. The position I took, and my wife with me was that the abolition of the dominion of the man over the woman and the freedom of the woman in marriage was the true solution of the problem. I have never for a moment wavered in this. I see clearly the same bondage that you see, and am just as determined to have the race rid of it, but the method I would maintain is far different from that which you advance. That is, our difference is in the remedy, and not in the diagnosis of the disease.

I will add, that as I read the immutable nature of things, Love is first, Wisdom is second, and Freedom is third and last in the trinity of the departments of Being. You put Freedom first. This difference between us is fundamental.

I see clearly that a better day is coming, when, out of hunger and thirst after righteousness, a liberty under law will arise, which will dome the world with well-being and peace.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAU.

CHAPTER XXXXI.

The brown curly head was resting on the snowy pillow. The maimed arm had been tenderly cared for, and already the tired eyes were drooping. It had been such an exciting day. So many changes had taken place. Cora's heart had been stirred to its very depths and it was a relief to be at last alone. Alice was bending above her about to bestow her good night kiss upon the faintly smiling lips.

"Good night, dear one. I hope you may spend this first night within the walls of this home in restful sleep. I, too, am tired and wish to rest. If you should require anything ring this bell, and I know Mary will instantly attend to your wants. The fact that you are Imelda's sister will alone insure you the entrance to her heart."

"O thank you! thank you ever so much. Everybody is so kind to me. I do not deserve it, I am sure."

"O yes, you do. How can you speak like that? And now once more, good night." Two pairs of warm clinging lips met in a loving kiss, then the form of Alice vanished, and Cora was alone. In but a very few minutes sleep had closed the tired eyelids and happy dreams brought sweet smiles to the rosy lips.

Alice glided quickly through the silent hall until she reached her own cozy, comfortable room. It was in utter darkness, which, however, did not intimidate her in the least. At times she rather liked the darkness. It was then so pleasant to sit at the window star-gazing, and let her thoughts wander whithersoever they would. So she crossed the room to where a comfortable rocker was standing, and sinking into its depths with a weary sigh, she prepared herself for her favorite indulgence. Hastily undoing the fastenings of her dress she then clasped her hands above her head, gazing up into the starlit heavens, gently rocking back and forth in the darkness.

Suddenly she stopped and listened. It seemed to her as though there was someone else in the room. She could have sworn that the sound of heavy breathing had been borne to her ear, though now that she listened, everything was quiet. But the feeling of another's presence seemed conveyed to her in the air itself—she felt it. With a quick nervous movement she rose and walked across the room. She could feel her very lips grow cold, but with a strength and courage of which one would scarce have believed the little woman capable, she controlled every outward manifestation of fear, and securing a match she deliberately struck it and, mounting a chair, lit two jets ere she ventured a single look about her; then with a smothered frightened cry she would have fallen had not the man, whom she had seen and recognized, caught her in his arms and prevented a mishap. Gently he lifted her down and reseated her in the rocker at the window. He, too, was pale, white to the very lips, as he saw the impression his presence made upon the pale little woman. He stepped back a few paces and waited for her to speak, and when no sound came he hesitatingly, in trembling accents, articulated her name,

"Alice!"

But her only answer was a frightened look. Holding both his hands to her in a supplicating manner, venturing a step nearer,

"Alice, am I never to be forgiven? Listen to me! If ever a man has been thinking—if ever it has come to a human heart, or understanding, that a great wrong has been committed, it has come to me. I know I have wronged you. I know I have acted like a brute! But I would, in some way or measure, make good the wrong I have done."

The hands of Alice were closely pressed upon her wildly beating heart. Her lips were twitching in a manner that caused Lawrence's heart to give a bound. In a moment he had forgotten that he was the suppliant. He knelt at her side and caught both her hands in his, pressing them together and chafing them.

"Alice! Alice! little girl. Don't look at me like that. You need not be afraid of me now, or ever again. I mean every word that I say. Come, trust me! It is the one boon I ask"—and he gently drew the excited little woman nearer to him, winding his arm about her as tenderly as of yore. Laying his face to hers, his lips touched the pretty pink ears.

"Little sister," he whispered, "can you, will you once more trust me?"

"Little sister?" Had she heard aright? What was the meaning the words conveyed? A hysterical sob broke from her lips, and as she permitted him to enfold her in his embrace, with an impulsive movement she placed her hands on either side of his face.

"Lawrence! Lawrence! do you mean it? You have not come to mock me?"

"I mean it, little girl, every word of it. Henceforth, you shall be my dearly cherished sister, with just the same liberty and privileges I would grant to her, were you really a sister and dearly loved as such."

A few moments she leaned back that she might the better look him in the eyes. Then she wound her arms about his neck and nestled her head close upon his breast and the words,

"I love you, Lawrence," thrilled him to his innermost being. He understood well the meaning of those words. He had called her sister, and he knew the love she gave him now was the same as every pure woman gives a dearly loved and cherished brother.

Once again a week had passed, and again merry laughter resounded through the rooms. Happy voices were heard blending in song while skillful fingers evoked sweet strains of music. But faces which were new within these rooms—though not new to us, were revealed in the bright light. Edith and Hilda Wallace had found their way into this enchanted circle tonight. Alice was seated at the piano. Her fingers lightly running over the keys, playing the accompaniment to Cora's rich sweet voice as it rose and fell in the cadence of sweet strains of song. The two were like a world unto themselves tonight, paying little attention to the others, each of whom was absorbed in giving attention to someone else. While Hilda actually seemed to fascinate Lawrence Westcot,—so absolutely was his attention riveted upon the sweet serious girl who possessed such a fund of knowledge that he thought he never had been so rarely entertained, Edith had taken Norman Carlton in tow, and by her serene and placid manner had so captivated him that for the past hour he had actually forgotten his queenly Imelda, who in her turn was talking just as seriously to a smooth-faced boy whose bright, intelligent countenance was a perfect mirror of the emotions that were being stirred within that young breast. Sometimes the blue eyes flashed, and with a quick peculiar motion of the hand he would toss back the fair hair from the white open brow; then he would ask question after question that, with never failing readiness, Imelda would answer.

"Wait right here," she said, "I will return in an instant,"—and in a very short time Imelda reappeared, carrying a small package in her hand. Before undoing it she laid her hand on his,

"I may call you Osmond, may I not?" The clear eye met hers in a responsive glance; in turn he laid his hand over hers and in a tone which had a hearty ring he replied:

"Certainly! It will afford me the greatest pleasure to have you do so."

Reseating herself in the chair she had a few moments ago vacated, with deft fingers that were slightly trembling, Imelda undid the cord that bound the package. The next moment Margaret's sweet face was brought to view. The boy's hand trembled as he reached for it, and in his face was reflected the emotions that were stirring his young soul. Imelda watched him closely, as for a long time his eyes were riveted on that fair reflection, and when with a fluttering long-drawn sigh he laid it aside without comment, she also said nothing, but handed him a second portrait; this time the face reflected being that of Mrs. Leland.

It seemed almost Margaret over again, the resemblance was so great; only where time had touched it; the years having left their trace—but only lightly. The brow was just as smooth as that of the young girl; the eye as clear and sparkling; the hair dark and full. But there was a line about the expressive mouth,—an expression on the face that was not on the younger one, and which only experience could have stamped thereon. It seemed to the boy standing there, holding in his hand the s if I had lost something to which I had a right, but which sha been withheld from me. But when I recall all that which my father has told me of bygone years it seems as if they were handsome, glittering, fascinating serpents looking up at me, luring me from my allegiance." Imelda took both the boy's hands in hers,

"Look at me," she said. "In the first place, tell me—do you think I could be guilty of all the cruel, unholy things that have been reported to you of your mother?"

"Why, no! no! A thousand times no! It would be impossible. One look into your face, into your eyes, would convince me of that."

"Thank you! but do you think, my young friend, that I could hold one near and dear who is so vile as you have been taught to believe your mother to have been? Now listen: I picture of his mother, as if in the eyes gazing at him there was a pleading, yearning look that went straight to his young heart. His sensitive lip quivered and with another sigh he also laid this picture down. He kept his eyes downcast as if he dared not look into those searching dark wells that were so eagerly fastened upon him. In a little while a woman's soft hand was laid upon his and——

"Osmond,"—a pleading voice spoke,—"do either of those faces portray aught but purity? Do you think your mother" (laying her hand on the picture), "with a face like that, could be capable of anything but what is good and pure and noble?" His eyes were raised to hers, and they were dim with unshed tears.

"I don't know. But my brain seems reeling. When I look at the face of the girl you say is my sister a feeling comes to me as though I should be proud to proclaim her as such to the world; while she who is my mother seems to draw my very soul from me. Looking at them both a feeling overcomes me do not want you to take my word for all that I have told you of these my best friends. Only wait, come here often. Here you can become acquainted with the sentiments that fill your mother's whole heart and soul, and which find a reflection in every word uttered by your fair young sister. You seem, despite all the prejudices with which your young life has been poisoned, to yet have remained pure in heart. You are brave and truthful. Now from this time forth in justice to your mother, study your father; his modes of life; his sentiments; his every action, and compare it to that which he has told you of the woman who, being the mother of his children, ought to be shielded and protected by him from every breath of scandal; instead of which protection he has blazoned such awful tales about her that it takes almost superhuman courage and bravery on her part to live them down. So I ask you again, in justice to the woman who is your mother, will you henceforth keep your eyes open?"

A dark wave of color swept over Osmond's face, then with outstretched hand, he said:

"I promise you that I will!"

This conversation closed, the pictures carefully laid away, their attention was called to the other occupants of the room. The first words that greeted their ears fell from the lips of Hilda. They listened.

LOVE, MARRIAGE, AND DIVORCE

And the Sovereignty of the Individual.

A Discussion between Henry James, Horace Greely, and Stephen Pearl Andrews. There are here included the final replies of Mr. Andrews, refused by the New York Tribune, and a subsequent discussion, occurring twenty years later, between Mr. James and Mr. Andrews.

"The great lesson for the world to learn is that HUMAN BEINGS DO NOT NEED TO BE TAKEN CARE OF. What they do need is such conditions of justice and freedom and friendly co-operation that they can take care of themselves. Provided for by another, and subject to his will as the return tribute, they pine, and sicken, and die. This is true equally of women as of men: as true of wives as it is of vassals or serfs. Our whole existing marital system is the house of bondage and the slaughter-house of the female sex. Whether the evils are inherent or incidental, whether they belong to the essence or only to administration of the institution, whether they are remediable without or only by means of revolution, are the questions that now have to be discussed."

A Scene from the Inquisition.*

They have chained me in the central hall
And are letting drops of water fall
On my forehead so close to the granite wall—
Drop——drop!

They were cold at first, but now they are warm,
And I feel a prick like the prick of a thorn,
Which comes with the fall of each drop so warm.
Drop——drop!

A circle I feel, beginning to form,
A circle of fire round each drop so warm,
A circle that throbs to the prick of the thorn—
Drop——drop!

The circle is growing between my eyes—
Each drop that falls increases the size,
And a flame of fire upward flies
At each
Drop——drop!

It's growing larger; My God! the pain
Of this awful, damnable, circular flame
Cutting its way through my throbbing brain—
Drop——drop!

It's growing larger, dilating my brain
Before its circular, throbbing flame,
Till I feel like a universe of pain—
Drop——drop!

Suns of fire are falling fast—
Drop——drop!
On to my brain; Oh, God! can this last?—
Drop——drop!

The stars of the universe all beat time,
As each raging sun of heat and flame
Falls with a measured throb on my brain—
Drop——drop!

Time has grown as large as my brain,
Drop——drop!
Ten million years of agonized pain
Lie between the fall of each sun of flame—
Drop——drop!

Something is coming!
Drop——drop!
Something is going to happen!
Drop——

Something has snapped!
The falling suns cease!
Oh, God! can it be that you've sent me release?

It is death.

An "Autonomistic Marriage" in Missouri.

BY E. C. WALKER.

The Eastern dailies give us meager information concerning a couple of social rebels in the Southwest. It appears that Charles Lavalette, the twenty-one years old son of a wealthy Frenchman, and Emma Mohr, seventeen years of age, became lovers some six months ago. We are told that "young Lavalette believes that marriage enslaves a woman, and deprives her of the rights she would enjoy as a spinster." Miss Mohr agreed with him, and the first result was that the two set up housekeeping together without first consulting a representative of either church or state. The second result was that society ostracised the young man and woman, and the third result was their arrest, at the instance of Lavalette pere, for "disorderly conduct." They were found guilty and fined. Offered freedom on condition that they recant and marry, they refused and therefore spent a week in jail for their contumacy. Released from prison, they resumed their relation. But graver dangers threaten them. June 1 the amended age-of-consent law goes into effect in Missouri. Last winter the moralist meddlers succeeded in getting the age of consent raised to twenty-one years. "Prosecuting attorney Norris says that if the two are living together on that date he will arrest Lavalette and send him to the penitentiary—a thing he will be abundantly able to do if the couple do not separate or marry." So wires the reporter. He continues:

Both the young people deny that they favor free love. They are only opposed to the rite of marrying, because it is an abridgement of the rights of the woman.

It is quite evident that these young persons of St. Joseph, if correctly represented by the newspaper men, have more generous impulses and courage than they have clear ideas on social matters. Repudiating the authority of ecclesiastic and magistrate, and asserting their right to choose for themselves, they stand squarely on the main plank of the platform of that free love with which they are said to disclaim all sympathy. Again: Marriage abridges the liberty of man no less than the liberty of woman, and his condition is more tolerable than hers only to the extent that he refuses to abide by the creed he professes to accept. To return to the declarations of young Lavalette, as we get them through the newspapers:

I suppose I will be called a crank, but I do not believe in marriage. It is true that the law provides for the rights of the wife, but is there any reason a man cannot make the same provision as well as the law? I did not marry simply because I did not believe in it.

I have no particular theory that would take the place of marriage, but I am opposed to the condition of life in which nine-tenths of the married women are to be found today.

They are little better than slaves, in my opinion. I have noticed that all my life, ever since a boy. I do not contend that the world would be better if there was no marriage, no law to govern people, and things like that, I am not an Anarchist by any means. I only believe that the woman I live with would be in a far better condition if she is not bound to me by process of law; then she can do as she pleases and I cannot wrong her in the name of the law and as her lawful husband.

My ideas were not obtained from life in Paris, as may be supposed. I know all about the women of Paris who live on the outer fringe of society. That is not my idea of the social structure of all, but I contend that many of them live lives that are to be preferred to those of half the wives. I can see that my plan would not do for a universal one, but it would in my case. I never expected to attract any attention, and I did not want any notoriety.

My own experience, in a like emergency, with callow report-

* This poem was selected and published by me in "Fair Play," of Jan. 11, '90. It was credited to Harry Stacpoole. In the "Woman's Tribune" of May 29, '97, it appears as written "For the Tribune" by M. A. Maitland. It is astonishing how people will appropriate poems which they are incapable of writing, and often deceive editors. I have had a good deal of experience with such would-be poets. I have received poems copied from Whittier and Byron, purporting to be original, but luckily I recognized them. I think that such acts of literary piracy should be exposed when discovered. L. H.

ers makes me hesitate to criticise anything attributed to Mr. Lavalette by a writer probably wholly unfitted, by lack of acquaintance with social problems, to understand the reformer's utterances. But assuming, for the nonce, that the young man's views are substantially as stated, it is in order to say, referring to his remarks touching Anarchism, that he is an Anarchist, so far as his personal relation to marriage is concerned. In his own case, he wants "no law to govern people," in domestic affairs, although he seems willing that others should be forced to submit to the law that to him is unbearable. He innocently assumes that the State should let him do as he pleases while compelling other persons to do as it pleases. He thought he and Miss Mohr would not come to harm if let alone, and he imagined that he would be permitted to "gang his ain gait" in a community where others were hobbled and led by parson and legislator. "I never expected to attract any attention, and I did not want any notoriety." The simplicity of it! As though a young man and woman could live together in a small town or rural neighborhood and not attract attention and achieve notoriety! He and his companion have very quickly learned that innocence or the assumption of innocence is no protection against persecution. It is a legal maxim that "ignorance of the law excuses no man," and it is equally true that ignorance of religious and social forces grants no immunity to the man or woman who ignores popular prejudices. Unfortunately, Mr. Lavalette is not alone in his simplicity—at least one prominent radical writer has yet to learn the same bitter lesson that the young Frenchman is now spelling out. This is not a free country, and hence we cannot do as we could in a free country. The battle for sexual liberty is yet to be fought, and before it is won blood will flow under the surgeon's knife and lives will go out in the electric chair and on the hangman's scaffold. Then will come the deluge.

The high age-of-consent people may felicitate themselves—the poison tree they have planted and watered is bearing its noxious fruit. As was to have been expected, frankly honest men and women are its first victims. As in the ages past, the minions of a rotten moralism murder the hopes and happiness of the children of liberty. As always before, the foulest crimes are committed in the alleged interest of "purity" and "virtue." The flag of Freethought is stained, stained almost too deeply to be ever cleansed, for self-vaunted "Freethinkers" have been and are leaders in the fanatical crusade for high age-of-consent laws, even as the great mass of the "Liberal" army ranges itself in defense of the abomination of compulsory sexual association, that is, of legal marriage.

The fetichistic belief that men aggregated may rightfully do what men individually may not rightfully do is the grossest political and social superstition of our time, and its eradication is imperatively demanded in the interest of human growth and consequently of human civilization. The corporate ignoramus, bandit and tyrant known as the State is the executive arm, so to speak, of that other corporate ignoramus, bandit and tyrant known as the Church. It is axiomatic that "corporations have no souls," and it is no less true that they have neither brains nor sympathies. The individuals composing them may be moral or immoral, bright or dull, gentle or cruel, but the only authority they have to do collectively what they could not justly do individually is the authority of superior power. Historically and actually, morality has no other basis. It is no more a "sin," an act of "rebellion," to resist an invasive corporation than it is to resist an invasive individual. What we may do in any given case, against an offender of either class, is to be determined by expediency alone.

"The State of Missouri" is a convenient legal and political fiction. It has no rights as against Charles Lavalette and Emma Mohr.

T.—Your wife seems to be madly in love with you.

B.—Yes; you see, I took a vacation and came back a new man.—Town Topics.

One or Many Loves.

BY E. B. FOOTE, JR., M. D.

To the rational mind that has succeeded in largely divesting itself of prejudice, the problem of love relations remains a puzzling one; possibly because there is no common denominator to be found in love and reason. The one may not be expected to understand the other, yet there are those who seem to have solved the perplexing problem for themselves and everybody else to their own satisfaction, if not to the satisfaction of all men and women involved in the tangle.

One extremist would get the sexes paired in marriage, with more or less regard to mutual attractions, and then seal their fate, leave no door of escape, and direct them to make the best of the arrangement till death do them part.

Another extremist says, "hands off"—let there be no pledging of faith and love, no promises that might be broken, no arrangements that may not be cancelled at short notice, no provision for parenthood. Leave all to the impulse and attraction of the day or hour, as though man's life were as ephemeral and careless as that of the butterfly and needed no more thought for the morrow.

Between these antipodal extremists are many mixed theories that would provide, either by love or custom, for some method in the operation of the madness of love, some elastic institution for satisfying its varying attractions, repulsions and results.

It is the purpose of this paper to review some late contributions by Messrs. Harman, Ruedebusch, Lloyd and Walker to this perpetual problem.

In Mr. Moses Harman's statement of the "Free Man's Creed" (Lucifer No. 653), the fundamentals are axiomatic and difficult to find fault with. He believes in "Freedom, Love and Wisdom—(knowledge utilized)." This broad creed thus briefly stated would find large acceptance, and even when he goes on to explain what he thinks these words involve he may have a very respectable following; for in advocating unlimited freedom of choice in love, some would say that true love, having discovered its mate, would wish for no freedom but to cleave to its object, and that a monogamic union based on this guarantee would be an entirely satisfactory substitute for the bonds of matrimony; but the possibility that love may wane, or discover new objects of attraction and yearn for other alliances,—this is the factor of the problem inviting complications and differences of opinion.

To hold two in the bonds of marriage after love is dead is certainly to profane the institution; but, on the other hand, to demand "freedom of choice" in love, "unlimited as to time," admitting that it may even desire a change more than once a day, is this not to profane love defined by Harman as "the uniting, combining, organizing, creative force of the universe . . . . the refining, purifying, uplifting, glorifying, happifying force of the universe"?

Granting that "there can be no love where freedom is not," can we fairly employ the word love where attraction varies from day to day, and exhibits no uniting, organizing, creative force? If love be the truly good and great force Mr. Harman has defined, must we not employ another word to distinguish the variable, inconstant and uncertain impulse which dares not and cares not to make any pledges beyond the fleeting hour, and is not lust a good enough word for this?

Mr. H. L. Green and other upholders of marriage as it is, complain that Mr. Harman and those who oppose marriage are not inclined to give in detail their solution of the relations of the sexes; that they hesitate to face and defend the logical outcome of unfettered sex impulses in a possible, general promiscuity; "that free love advocates" do not attempt to outline the probable outcome of practicalizing their theories; while on the other hand, it may be charged as truly against Mr. Green and other defenders of marriage that they cannot face and defend that institution when it compels its victims to live together after the true binding force of conjugal love has been replaced by the repellant force of hate.

Mr. Harman claims that the abolition of an enforced marriage contract will leave abundant opportunity for and disposition to voluntary monogamic unions, that "honor, candor, honesty and fidelity will remain," and "the true, rational family will take the place of the narrowly selfish despotism now called by that name"—that "love, friendship, liberty, equality, fraternity, peace and happiness will take the place of hate, despotism, war and misery;" but the status of such a family he does not clearly define. It must of course be based upon mutual and voluntary association, but a human family, to be worthy of the name, must have something of permanence, and with each partner free to follow and encourage other side attractions there would seem to be considerable risk of sundering relations before anything like a family had become established. Again, supposing a family arrangement of this kind has been started, and only one party to it becomes estranged by later attraction, what becomes of the peace and happiness of the other party, and what is to prevent hate, war and misery resulting from the sundering of ties when the love of one holds while that of the other draws to new relations?

Neither in present marriage nor in the scheme of voluntary monogamic unions do we find any satisfactory solution of the not uncommon problem, what's to be done when the love of one would maintain "the family" relations while that of the other would make a break for new.

REMARKS.

The questions raised by Dr. Foote cannot be adequately considered in the small space at my command in the current issue of Lucifer.

First. As to "lust," and its application to ephemeral love-attractions. The term lust means simply "desire," and may be applied, and is often applied, to any one of the animal or human appetites, as well as to the appetite, desire or instinct called sex-love. In my little pamphlet, "Motherhood in Freedom," I take the ground that, on the human plane, sex-life, sex-power, is multiplex or complex. It is physical, intellectual and psychic, with many possible subdivisions or phases. That some men, and also a few women, seem to have no other conception of love than in its physical aspect or animal manifestation, and that such persons quickly tire of one such attraction and seek other 'green fields and pastures new," like a bee flitting from flower to flower, should not be thought strange or wonderful when we consider the conditions under which the great masses of human beings are generated, gestated and born. The cure for the prevalence of ephemeral and purely physical or animal attractions is to be found in a larger freedom and in a better system of sex education.

Artificial restraints, legislative restrictions and canon law terrors, only increase the evils they seek to cure, and make those evils self-perpetuating.

Second. The objections that the advocates of sex freedom "do not attempt to outline the probable outcome of their theories," and that "the status of the family," under love in freedom, are not "clearly defined," are valid objections only in the eyes of those who believe in some kind of ownership based upon sex. To all others Freedom is a sufficient solution of all such problems. Once recognize woman's absolute right to self-ownership, including ownership of the product of her maternal powers, and the difficulties vanish,—as I earnestly believe.

As to the duties, the responsibilities, that fatherhood imposes, or will impose, in the societary reconstruction, this will probably be the subject of a supplementary chapter to the pamphlet, "Motherhood in Freedom."

A Principle Tried on a Dog.

George E. Macdonald, in "The Truth Seeker."

A New York man named Smith lost his dog. A few days later he met Mr. Jones leading the dog by a string. Smith told Jones that the dog was his, and tried to take it away from him. Both were arrested. The judge heard them both. He then had the two men taken into another room, while a policeman held the dog. Then the men were brought back into the court room and the dog was turned loose. The animal went at once to Smith, and nearly upset him in expressing his joy over the reunion. That settled the ownership of the dog.

Another Mr. Smith was a traveling man, and left his wife at home when he went on the road to rustle for subsistence. There was a railroad accident, and Mrs. Smith read in the papers that Mr. Smith had been killed. Having mourned him for a season, she married Jones. In brief time Smith came back, reaching home while Jones was out. Mrs. Smith-Jones found him irresistible. Later the two men clinched over the question whose wife she was, and which of them ought to get a divorce. They took the case into court. Did the judge send the men into another room while a policeman held the disputed possession, and then call them back to see which she would go to when they hove in sight? He did not, and the case is still pending.

The universal application of a principle cannot always be determined by trying it on a dog.

In the Arena.

BY MATADORE.

I have been looking for some fun, or a fight, for some time and had about decided on a disappointment, when lo! into Lucifer's arena rushed C. L. James like a mad bull. He was looking for something "Green," but will not find him. I can imagine Green vaulting the fence and making for the taller timber of respectability and eating his own words. So much for Green. But here is C. L. James with dirt on his horns, lashing his sides and looking for something to gore. How the epithets, innendoes and insinuations fly right and left as he goes snorting around the arena. My fine fellow, you shall not be allowed to vent your rage on nothingness. Anarchist, varietist, defender of the mob, know that I am not afraid of the respectables and conservatives and not yet of the "Firebrands" who write jumbles about communism, communistic-anarchy, socialistic-anarchy, etc.

Your contention seems to be that Individualists must either make their homes with Monarchists or State-socialists or pitch their tents with the Anarchists. You seem to think there is no station between "law enforced marriage" (by this I mean the law holding parties together in that relation against their consent) and prostitution variety. That was a red rag. See him plunge! Hold on! See this sharp sword? I would have you know that it is another bull that is being gored now.

You, I know, will answer some questions. You are looking for them. Well, here they are.

1. Have Individualists the right to co-operate against real criminal invasion?

2. If so how could such co-operation be effective without using force against the invader?

3. Suppose one's rights have been invaded against his consent, ought he or the criminal to have the right to compel the attendance of witnesses for prosecution or defense?

4. Suppose it be found that a criminal is a victim of a diseased brain or of weak hereditary organization are you in favor of hanging him or of restraining him in an asylum?

5. If you are in favor of the asylum, who should pay for the restraint?

6. Has a man and woman the natural right to form a mutual co-operative marriage for home building, procreation, etc.?

7. Should they do this mutually and voluntarily, are they sexual slaves?

8. Have children any rights that the parents ought to respect?

9. Is there any such thing as paternal responsibility or ought the woman to bear the burden alone?

10. If, after a man has become the father of children, he concludes to "silently steal away," ought the woman to have the co-operative help of others to compel him to share the care of the children?

11. At what age should children be turned out as prey to the law-enforced marriagists and prostitution-varietists?

Now "I conjure you by that which you profess, howe'er you came to know it, answer me to what I ask you." Come now, no shuffling, fuming, or invective, or I'll prick you in the shaggy sides with my long sharp sword.

The University Magazine on the American Movement.

One of the most gratifying of all the immediate results of the American agitation for Free Womanhood and Free Motherhood is the co-operation it is calling out from the English workers along the same or similar lines.

The "University Magazine and Free Review" for June, contains an article by A. Goldwin upon the "Legitimation League," from which we clip:

"The Legitimation League, founded originally for the purpose of remedying a grievous wrong by creating a machinery for acknowledging offspring born out of wedlock, and to secure for them equal rights with so-called legitimate children, has taken a new lease of life by extending its scope.

"Mr. Oswald Dawson, the founder, a gentleman of large heart, with sympathies, and advanced views, in the absence of legislation could not expect that his honest endeavors could be crowned with success, but his generous financial support and unflagging energy kept the movement alive, and the last general annual meeting at the Holborn Restaurant brought together a great number of sympathisers. A resolution to make London the headquarters of the Legitimation League was carried unanimously, while the proposal to extend the scope and to broaden the basis of the League, met with considerable opposition. 'To add to the objects of the League the education of public opinion in the direction of freedom in sexual relationships,' however, was carried, after a lively discussion, followed by the resignation of the President, Mr. Wordsworth Donisthorpe, who, in the new departure saw a Free Love propaganda, which impression, no doubt, was correct. A confirmation of the President's view as to the meaning of the words 'the education of public opinion in the direction of freedom in sexual relationships' may be found in the election of Lillian Harman, the American apostle of Free Love, to the presidency of the Legitimation League.

"'Free Love,' although practiced in England as much as elsewhere, is the bugbear of respectability, and thus the task of the L. L., to educate public opinion, seems a gigantic one. But, on the other hand, we must consider that the meaning of the term, 'Free Love' is so little understood that even intelligent men confound it with promiscuity.

"A perusal of the creed of Moses Harman, the editor of Lucifer, the American paper dedicated to the Free Love propaganda, will be interesting and instructive alike. In mitigation of Mrs. Grundy's sentence, it has been urged that the results of the teachings of the Free Love apostles, considered so dangerous at first sight, has been the opposite of what has been expected, in so far that the majority of the unions have proved happy and permanent, and that this Free Love will in the end resolve itself into Free Monogamy, as a substitute for enforced marriage."

Here follows the "Free Man's Creed," as published in the "Free Thought Magazine" for April, and reproduced in Lucifer No. 653, or the greater portion thereof. In closing Mr. Goldwin says:

"From the above it will be seen that the American Free Lovers are far from advocating promiscuity and that they are not opposed to monogamy. They object to marriage, that is to the legal tie.

"It seems that an easy divorce, or divorce by mutual consent would attain the object which the Free Love propaganda professes to have in view, not a judicial divorce, but the registration of divorce or a formal dissolution of the union in cases where the interests of children are concerned."

A few comments on the above may not, perhaps, be amiss.

First. Neither Lillian nor Moses Harman aspire to leadership, or "apostle"ship, in the sex freedom movement. Their desire, their ambition, is simply to be co-operators or helpers in what they believe the most necessary of all reforms,—whether social, political, religious or economic.

Second. In writing and publishing the article, "A Free Man's Creed," Moses Harman did not assume to speak for the "American Free Lovers." In this, as well as in all that he writes for the journal which Mr. Goldwin calls "the American paper dedicated to the free love propaganda," he claims to represent no one but himself.

Third. As to "Free Monogamy, as a substitute for enforced marriage"—whether this is to be the "end" or final result of the agitation for sex-freedom I, for one, do not care to express a positive opinion. The main thing, if not the only thing, for us to do now is to inaugurate freedom and justice by eliminating slavery and injustice. Believing, as I do, that woman, in her relations of wife and mother, is incomparably the greater sufferer from marriage, and that the enslavement of woman in these relations reacts upon the race as a whole—thereby incriminating and perpetuating slavery for all, except the prenatally and postnatally favored few—I try to make the main fight in defense of woman's right to self-ownership, and to freedom of choice, at all times and in all matters pertaining to the work that nature has given her a monopoly of—the conception and the building of new human beings.

When freedom and justice shall have taken the place of slavery and injustice it is quite safe to assume that woman's native instincts and her evoluted conscience and judgment, will be the best possible guides as to whether "exclusive or inclusive love-relations" will be best for herself, for her children, or for the race of humankind. I think it quite probable, however, that under freedom there will be great diversity, rather than uniformity, of sex relationships or sex companionships. Reasoning from analogy, from all we know of life in its limitless manifestations, we would naturally expect to see all possible phases or forms of association practicalized,—some choosing exclusive, monogamous, or life-long companionships with one sex-mate; others would choose a very limited or very select variety; others less select, or more nearly "promiscuous" in habits of sex-life, but it seems inconceivable that, under the reign of love in freedom, there could be an approach, even, to the promiscuous associations that now so extensively prevail, in so-called Christian lands, as one of the results of law-enforced marriage.

The "University Magazine and Free Review" is a large monthly publication, standing in the front rank, if not at the very head, of English periodical literature, in the freedom, boldness and ability with which it attacks the superstitions, the taboos and fetiches, the vices, the follies and the crimes of modern society. Published by the "University Press," 16 John street, Bedford Row, W. C. London. Price 25 cents.

"The Adult."

Lucifer is in receipt of Vol. I. No. 1 of the "Adult," a "Journal for the Advancement of Freedom in Sex Relationships," a sixteen page magazine, having for its motto,

"Sex contains ALL, bodies, souls, meanings, proofs, purities."
—Walt Whitman.

The leading editorial contains the following statement of objects, together with a much appreciated reference to Lucifer and "Our New Humanity."

"The 'Adult' is the organ of the Legitimation League. Its pages will be open for the discussion of important phases of sex questions which are almost universally ignored elsewhere. We recognize with full appreciation the efforts made by two or three journals in America, and a smaller number in this country, to consider from time to time some of the topics 'The Adult' will make particularly its own. The work that Lucifer and 'Our New Humanity,' have already accomplished in America, through the efforts of the brave band which Lillian Harman and her noble father, Moses Harman, have gathered round them, will inspire us to emulate their whole-heartedness in the cause of sex reform. We shall endeavor to notice every effort in this country in the same cause, whenever an English magazine or journal opens its columns to outspoken speech on behalf of freedom.

"The name of our paper, 'The Adult,' signifies that we recognize the paramount right of the individual to self realization in all non-invasive directions. 'The Adult' advocates the absolute freedom of two individuals of full age, to enter into and conclude at will, any mutual relationships whatever, where no third person's material interests are concerned, and that in such cases as involve consideration of the interests of children, it should be regarded as an axiom that a home shared by unwilling partners is never a happy environment for children."

As further statement of what the "League" means the following paragraphs are here inserted.

A CRUSADE AGAINST CUSTOM.

"The Legitimation League exists for the purpose of entering a protest against current iron-bound marriage customs, which tend to crush individuality, in a direction where it is most needed. In our present marriage customs too much is taken for granted—the future is enslaved to an emotion of the present or the past, men and women are treated as incapable of self-restraint, and consequently self-realization becomes impossible. Women are treated as if they were children, to be legislated for, and to be kept in ignorance of emancipating knowledge. Men are credited with a capacity to enter into, and conclude, all other contracts than that one contract which most concerns their own happiness. The theory of perpetual marriage is that a man and woman's love for one another must be given once and for all, and exclusively, while universal experience agrees that such love is rarer than a December rosebud. The happiness of millions is sacrificed to an ideal, fit only for a rare few. . . . ."

MONOPOLY AND JEALOUSY.

"The monopolistic instinct of mankind—nowhere more reprehensible than in the relations of the sexes, needs to be deprecated in all such directions. The sense of right to exclusive possession, with its corollary of envy, hatred, jealousy and all uncharitableness, must be steadily discountenanced. Love must be free, not only from legal and ecclesiastical restraint, but also from the petty malice of those who, having once held in willing service a human soul, refuse to relinquish a claim whose only excuse was absolute mutuality of concurrent desire. We protest also against the theory underlying laws, marriage settlements, and popular practice, that a woman's person can be the 'property' of her husband. The heavy fines paid to a husband in respect of depreciation of his 'property' by reason of an adulterous alliance, are revolting to all who value liberty, as insulting to the woman, and incompatible with any right definition of manly love or even self-respect."

A second object of the "League" is to "create a machinery for acknowledging offspring born out of wedlock, and to secure for them equal rights with legitimate children"—so-called. It seems strange that such work should be necessary in an age of alleged "enlightenment." Nature knows no legitimacy except that which gives the best endowment of mind and body. Then why should human law recognize any other meaning to the word, as applied to the birth status of any human being?

"The Logical Processes of the Practical American Mind."

EDITOR JOURNAL:—In your first editorial this morning you suggest that the illogicality of the American mind is evidenced by the fact that, while the people as represented by the mob insist upon the infliction of the death penalty for rape, the American mind as represented by the legislature fails to make this the legal punishment for the crime named. I would respectfully call your attention to the fact that the American mind stumbles continually over this question of rape. For instance: A logical mind would perceive that, granting rape to be a crime, it is a crime no matter by whom committed. Yet it was only a short time ago that Judge Gunster, of Pennsylvania, gave it as his judicial opinion that the husband is justified, morally and legally, in using so much force as may be necessary to induce his wife to yield to his demands. And the average American mind, including that section of it engaged in making and enforcing laws, agrees heartily with Judge Gunster. Will you not let your readers see that your mind, at least, is logical by denouncing this most unjust and unreasonable discrimination? But I must tell you frankly that it will be dangerous so to do. Moses Harman did so once, through the pen of a correspondent of his paper, and he received a sentence of five years in the Kansas penitentiary. This outrage was committed under the aegis of the "Comstock law," a statute which very few of the newspaper organs of the American mind have the intelligence or the courage to condemn. It was pretended that Moses Harman had admitted obscene language into the columns of his paper, but in truth the "Markland Letter" was no more obscene than your editorial, that is, not obscene at all.

This was called out by an editorial in the New York "Journal" on the Urbana lynching. Of course the death penalty for rape is as irrational as would be the death penalty for breaking an arm. Rape is a serious invasion, but in the absence of sexual superstitions it would not (in the case of adults) be regarded as more criminal than an assault breaking the bones of the victims, unless, of course, it resulted in the injury of the parts. SERVICES OF UNLIMITED VALUE. Buildings costing years of labor of hundreds of men may be exposed to loss by fire. A few minutes labor intelligently applied may save them from destruction. Those few minutes are worth more to the owner of the buildings and to the community than a life-time of hod-carrying.

Again, an educated man may in a few minutes invent machinery which will do the work of a million men. The sewing machine became possible from the idea of making the eye at the point of a needle. That fundamental conception has led to the creation of an immense amount of wealth, of which the inventor has received but little.

So in a thousand ways the accumulation of wealth opens the way for still further accumulations, in the benefits of which the whole community largely share.

Whether a man earning by saving or creating an unusually large amount of wealth, will use it for the benefit of the community, is his own affair. The community has no right to rob him of it if he prefers to keep it or to spend it to suit himself. It ought to be superfluous to add that, especially in the case of a new invention, even were the whole advantages to be given to the inventor during his entire life, which would be practically impossible, these advantages are constantly increasing as time passes, and in the end the whole world shares the entire benefit.

REMARKS.

Not as a socialist but as an individualist I take the ground that no invention that increases wealth or saves labor is the work of any one man, or of any one era of time. The lightning-rod and the sewing machine, for instance, are the result of the co-operative thought of a vast number of minds and of many ages of time. They are racial inventions, and the race as a whole should share in their benefits. No one should be made rich by a lucky "find." The treasures of thought, like the treasures that lie in the bosom of our common mother, the earth, should belong to all. Thomas Paine set an example that should have been heeded by the people whose independence he did so much to make possible. He would have no patent on his machines or on his books. The patent laws are an invasion and a curse, not a blessing, and the present very unsatisfactory working of our economic system is due, in part, to monopoly by the few, of the benefits resulting from the discoveries of inventive genuises, so-called. HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXXII.

"You speak of the prevailing spirit, of too little charity of man to fellowman," said Hilda, "and again of single instances where charitable deeds rise to the heights of grandeur only regretting that they are too few, too rare to be of any real value to humanity. Aye! they are indeed too rare; but I do not believe in charity. I do not like her. I have no room for her. Does she ever draw near to the side of justice? Is her garb not rather a cloak wherewith to hide all the abounding and heartless cruelty which seizes and retains the lion's share of the product of all the weary hours of toil that produce the wealth wherewith these deeds of charity are done?

"But that is only one kind of charity. That charity which is supposed to overlook, to condone, and even to justify that which society treats as faults and sins—O, how I hate it! For while charity pretends to do all this, in reality it condemns every idea, every thought, every action that is not in strict conformity with the prevailing standards and customs of artificial society. Charity enchains liberty; it blindfolds and fetters justice. No! a thousand times no! I scorn charity, no matter in what garb she may seek to approach."

Hilda's dark gray eyes shone with a lustrous light as she finished her animated speech. Imelda thought she had never seen her so attractive.

"Bravo, little girl," she exclaimed, "your words ought to inspire brave hearts to noble deeds."

Hilda blushed as she replied,

"O no, I do not aspire to so great an honor; but at times I feel I must give vent to my feelings. They oppress me so."

"Will you permit me to ask you a question?" It was Lawrence who spoke.

"A dozen if you wish."

"Then tell me what would you put in place of charity which you so discard? You cannot but acknowledge that there is great need of a helping hand."

"Thank you, Mr. Westcot. Had you tried for a week you could not have asked a question that would afford me greater pleasure to answer. 'What would I substitute for charity?' Why, Justice! Justice every time. Where Justice reigns there can be no place for Charity. She will not be needed. She will have lost her vocation. Let justice be done to the great masses, to the struggling individual, and where would there be occasion to call for the assistance, the services, of the haughty dame with her mock humility? None whatever! Where plenty and peace have found a home there will be no occasion to air her gaudy plumage. And in a short time her very name will have assumed a strange sound. Aye, it would be forgotten from little usage; would become extinct, obsolete. One pushed into the background she would quietly step down and out and be heard of no more."

"And," added Edith, "with the advent of justice and the exit of charity another thing would become extinct, and that is power—the power of money. When justice is done, the toiler, the producer, receiving the full value or equivalent of his labor, it would be impossible that a few favored idlers should grow fat—in wealth and ease, while the masses starve. No more strikes, no more robbery, no more bloodshed. Peace, happiness, prosperity—would not that be an ideal world?"

Here the refrain was taken up by Imelda.

"No strikes, no robbery, no bloodshed! Do we properly consider the full import of these words? We hurl the curse of baseness, of low and brutal instincts, we charge the birth of vice, crime, hatred and what not, all upon those who toil and produce. If in a measure it is true that the very air surrounding this class of humanity is often pregnant with all the elements that breed and call into existence a state of things so depraved, is it to be wondered at? Let us take into consideration what the women of the despised classes are called upon to pass through. Let us ask the why and wherefore. When hunger and starvation stares her in the face; when the demon drink has entered her home; when the husband and father is thrown out of work through no fault of his; when the monster monopoly has shed precious blood, and made her home desolate—what then, think you, breeds in the heart of woman? Her every thought, her every breath, must of necessity be freighted with—murder! Then the little helpless unborn, the human embryon, that is being gestated and fed with such nourishment—must not, of necessity, a race of murderers, of criminals of every description, be the product of such creative conditions?

"When mothers are free to choose the fathers of their babes; when they can have just the conditions that their hearts long for; when they can be free from care and anxiety; when every woman has learned the science of becoming a perfect mother; when every mother understands the fearful responsibility of becoming such; when every father is filled with a sense of the high honor that has been conferred upon him in being chosen to be such; when, in consequence, he recognizes the duties he owes to woman and her offspring, and when in every act of his life he seeks to aid her in perfecting the coming being; then, and not till then, may we expect peace and joy and happiness. And to bring about such a state of things justice must be done."

Strange words these, that fell for the first time, upon the ear of young Osmond Leland. He heard thoughts expressed that struck him as grand, lofty, sublime, but—but—did they not savor of—well, the insane? Was there any sense in dreaming of such impossibilities? As each of these young ladies in turn had spoken they had appeared to him as though surrounded with a halo, such a sublime light had shone in their eyes. But again, to him, it seemed as if their reasoning was devoid of reason, and his mind reverted to the discarded figure of charity. He could conceive of no other way to reach the suffering masses. Until now he had scarcely thought of it. But now? What sort of women were these that could express themselves thus? What was it Imelda had said?

"Wait, and come often. Here you can become acquainted with the sentiments that fill your mother's heart and soul, and that finds reflection in every word uttered by your sister."

He could not comprehend the reasoning of these young women, but the air surrounding them seemed so truly holy and pure; such as had never been his fate to come in contact with. And his mother and sister?—Were they as these? Had he much to forgive his father for? He felt dazed. Was this also a case where gross injustice had been done?

"But how, young ladies, would you make all your grand ideas practicable?" asked Lawrence.

"By proclaiming liberty," answered Hilda. "Liberty will insure justice, and justice liberty. The two combined will make truth possible. To be truthful is to be natural, and nature is pure; nature is chaste. Only think what it all would mean to be free! We hear the cant of freedom, of liberty, of a 'free country,' all around us, when in reality it is all a miserable sham! Every word must be guarded, every action fettered. We must eat, drink, sleep, walk and talk all according to a prescribed fashion; must bow to fashion, to custom. We may not even welcome a child to our arms when we desire it, unless we have first allowed shackles to be placed upon our freedom; unless we have first bartered our womanhood for motherhood—often turning what should be a priceless boon to a most bitter curse."

Hilda's eyes were sparkling with brilliant flashes, but the eyes of Cora, who with Alice had drawn near, were downcast, and on the dark lashes clung two pearly drops. Music and song had ceased; the two performers, Alice and Cora, had for some time been listening to the soulful words that were being spoken. The sweet lips of the agitated girl were quivering as with pain, her hands tightly clasped as she repeated, "turning the precious boon so often into a bitter curse." Turning to Hilda and kneeling at her feet Cora laid her face upon her knee.

"Is the curse never to be lifted?"

"Yes! When woman is ready to be blessed; when she has learned to keep herself pure; when the sacred temple of her body no longer is invaded by the curse of lust; when man no longer dares to intrude, to force his unwelcome caresses and attentions upon her, but patiently bides his time at a respectful distance."

"You speak of the 'millenium,' of the perfection of the race. Must our lives become long sacrifice to secure that end?" Hilda shook her head as with both hands she lifted the tear-wet face.

"I hope not! Whilst we all have a work to perform in the meantime, I believe we may yet be able, in our own lives, to so far lift ourselves out of and above all the pains that make life such a weary round of toil, as to be able to enjoy just a little in advance, of what the coming future will bring the now enslaved race. When we are brave enough, when we are strong enough to live as our inmost convictions tell us is right and true and pure, we may then hope for a little happiness, or perhaps a great happiness, just as we make ourselves ready to receive and appreciate it. And I feel so sure, so sure that here, just right here around us, a band is forming, true and staunch, that by its unity will enable us yet to realize what now seem but dreams!"

"You are speaking of that ideal home of yours?"

"Yes! If only——if only——I could once see the way clear as to where the means are to come from. Money! 'Filthy lucre,' as it is called, I fear is the rock that will upset our plans." But now Cora's eyes were shining.

"Money, money," she murmured. "I think I know who would furnish it—only will he not spurn me now? after I have disappointed him so, and brought the bitter pain to his heart? O, will he believe that it was all for love of him and not for myself that I seemingly flung aside the priceless treasure of his love?"

"If it is really that; if his love is a priceless treasure, he but awaits the call and you will find him at your side."

"And she," murmured Cora, "whom the law gives to him and him to her,—she will never willingly give him freedom."

"Wait, and you will see!" came the assuring answer, "Somehow I feel that all will be as we desire."

VARIOUS VOICES.

S. G. Lanham, Cleveland, O.:—The "Humanitys" have arrived, and have been started on a missionary tour. Success to the cause of Sex Freedom. It is up hill work approaching one on the sex question who has been schooled in the old order of things. I find it requires powerful intellects to conquer in this movement. I cannot give financial aid but moral support I can and will. Sex Freedom means Liberty for the individual, which when once secured will bring economic freedom.

C. C. Ladd, Hartline, Wash.:—In regard to the discussion on the marriage question I think it a genuine eye-opener. I wish every truth-seeker in the land could read it. I can see no reason why every candid person should not oppose our present marriage law. I am sorry that you write so discouragingly of the publication of "Hilda's Home," i. e. in book form. I think I could sell a number of copies this summer, but if I can do no better I would like to have you save me a file of Lucifers containing the complete story.

Essa B. Taylor, South Passadena, Calif.:—Enclosed find money order for one dollar, for which please extend Lucifer subscription from No. 658. Sorry to have let it run over. Lucifer is one of the things I think I cannot do without. Must say I was surprised at the ground taken by the "Free Thought Magazine" in the Putnam-Collins tragedy and think they had better rename their publication, as they are for anything else rather than freethought. Perhaps they think that freethought consists simply in fighting the Bible. Allow me to send regards to your daughter Lillian whom I honor for a brave, free woman. I am yours for freedom.

Myra Pepper, Ottumwa, Iowa:—I cannot understand such an anomaly as a Freethinker opposed to Freedom, but it seems that there are many yet occupying just such a position. Mr Green, in his argument, voices the sentiment of many so-called Liberals, and this fact only emphasizes, to my mind, the need of education on sex matters, as more important than in any other line. I know many good people who have outgrown the personal god idea and who are learning fast that all government is force, but who in the matter of freedom in sex relations cling as closely to orthodoxy as the ivy to the rotten oak.

In school work I have found that not one pupil in a hundred is capable of fully rounded scholarship. The mind of one runs to mathematics, of another to music, etc, etc. So in the matter of education in progressive thought. One is capable of broadening out in this way, one in that, and few, very few, can contemplate, or advocate and practicalize complete freedom in all directions. More are afraid of any disturbance in laws regarding marriage, etc., than in any other department of life, for the reason that the sex problem is the most vital to the race.

Women will be forced to take the lead in this matter, and I honor Miss Collins for her brave words as quoted. A few more such noble young women, trained as writers and speakers, would soon revolutionize the world. As you say in your article, it is but reasonable to suppose that nothing but good will come out of the "Boston Tragedy. How do we know but that the manner of their death may do more good than they could have done living? For one I fully believe that there are no mistakes in nature. The world is better for these two people having lived. I met Mr. Putnam about eleven years ago. He delivered a course of lectures here in Ottumwa. He was well received, and gave the best of satisfaction to all concerned. I was much impressed by his earnestness, and read eagerly all I could get from his pen in "Truth Seeker" and elsewhere. Like yourself I never thought to ask if he was married, being vastly more interested in the truths he enunciated than in his private affairs.

I cannot understand the motives of those who are forever prying into the private lives of public men and women and, vulture-like, seeking for that which will satisfy their appetites for carrion. I would not wonder at Christians hunting up the faults and weaknesses of our friends, and enlarging upon them; it is part of their stock in trade, but for a man who poses as teacher of freethought to range himself on the side of the persecutors of Liberals is a matter to be deplored. However, I can see good even in this, for it will bring many to a knowledge of their true positions, and cause them to express themselves for or against the progressive thought of today.

Anything is better than indifference.

It matters not to me nor to anyone else, whether Samuel P. Putnam and May L. Collins were lovers or not, but, as Mr. Walker said, I would like to think that they were.

LOVE, MARRIAGE, AND DIVORCE

And the Sovereignty of the Individual.

A Discussion between Henry James, Horace Greely, and Stephen Pearl Andrews. There are here included the final replies of Mr. Andrews, refused by the New York Tribune, and a subsequent discussion, occurring twenty years later, between Mr. James and Mr. Andrews.

"The great lesson for the world to learn is THAT HUMAN BEINGS DO NOT NEED TO BE TAKEN CARE OF. What they do need is such conditions of justice and freedom and friendly co-operation that they can take care of themselves. Provided for by another, and subject to his will as the return tribute, they pine and sicken, and die. This is true equally of women as of men; as true of wives as it is of vassals or serfs. Our whole existing marital system is the house of bondage and the slaughter-house of the female sex. Whether the evils are inherent or incidental, whether they belong to the essence or the administration of the institution, whether they are remediable without or only by means of revolution, are the questions that now have to be discussed."

Women of Today.

You women of today who fear so much
The women of the future, showing how
The dangers of her course are such and such—
What are you now?

Mothers and Wives and Housekeepers forsooth!
Great names! you cry; full scope to rule and please!
Room for wise age and energetic youth!—
But are you these?

Housekeepers! Do you then like those of yore
Keep house with power and pride, with grace and ease?
No, you keep servants only! What is more
You don't keep these!

Wives, say you? Wives! Blessed indeed are they
Who hold of Love the everlasting keys,
Keeping their husband's hearts! Alas the day!
You don't keep these!

And mothers? Pitying Heaven! Mark the cry!
From cradle death-beds! Mothers on their knees!
Why, half the children born as children die!
You don't keep these!

And still the wailing babies come and go,
And homes are waste, and husbands' hearts fly far,
There is no hope until you dare to know
The thing you are!

From Morality to Savoir Faire

Programme for a new chapter in White's "Conflict of Science with Theology."

BY C. L. JAMES.

Morality, in the mouths of nine people among every ten, means observing those customs to which they are used. In the tenth man's mouth it means observing some modification of those customs, which he is pleased to think would be an improvement. In every case, therefore, it means observing the customs of society, either as they are; as they tend, through the agitation raised by individuals, to become; or as they have been, though society has now outgrown them to the disgruntlement of conservative individuals.

The idea, as Plato would say, of morality, is always obedience to "a rule of action imposed by a superior power," even among moralists who dislike the existing rule. And in every case that superior power which does, has done, or is besought to do, the imposing, is society. True, society, at first, is quite identified with the clan totem or god. But the moment a "differentiation" between these conceptions arises, it becomes clear that morality is the human element of law, except in esse or posse, while the divine is something else—ritual, orthodoxy, in short religion. Moreover morality includes all that society is pleased to exact from its members—its canons of dress and etiquette no less than its laws about the sexual relation, about property, or about homicide.

If you doubt it, put on a felon's suit of stripes and promenade in a fashionable thoroughfare. Of course you will be mobbed. The police, far from protecting you, will very likely arrest you for "disorderly conduct." If you ask a reason of this persecution you will get one which contains the quintessence of "morality." "When you live among people, and accept their protection, you must not make yourself disagreeable by going against their customs."

At first sight, the reason appears forcible. But why is it disagreeable to see a man in a striped suit? No one possessing any scientific knowledge of anatomy or æsthetics will say that a striped suit is half as ugly as those monstrosities fashion actually requires women to put on their heads, shoulders and waists. It is offensive only to that instinct which requires people to do as others do—an instinct inherited from "our grandsire Ape." As to society's protection, it may have been valuable in the days of Achilles; but sensible people now consider that if society would only abstain from bullying them, they would cheerfully risk being murdered or otherwise incommoded by individuals. Morality, therefore, stands on a par with other institutions. It is a contrivance for preventing change, and therefore improvement. Naturally, when philosophers sought reasons for it, they made no great success. Their systems are worth running over, for this reason that they are all very old, and the man who revives one, as a discovery, is wasting time, which might be saved if he knew better.

Plato found a basis for morality in the eternal intellectual life, and condemned deviations from it as tending to the morality of brutes. This is exactly the Intuitional morality of our time. Aristotle regarded morality as the discharge of social functions—which is practically Herbert Spencer's view. Zeno gave this a transcendental character by declaring society itself a part of the great organism, (zoon) the universe; and Virtue the discharge of a function in nature—"life according to nature." Epicurus anticipated all that is repeated, with damnable iteration by Benthamites and "Egoists" today. Pyrrho preceded the Pessimists in declaring knowledge impossible, which makes passion foolish, and jog-trot "good behavior" the dictum of mere common sense.

The trouble with all these criteria is that they are too general to be of much practical use. How can we decide that an action tends towards Plato's heaven of ideas, towards the well being of society, towards the unknown purpose of creation, towards our own happiness, or, on sceptical and pessimistic principles, to anything? It does not seem difficult, indeed, to say that some actions do not; but I fail to see evidence that proving this ever prevents them. It did not keep from so low a vice as drunkenness men as intellectual as Webster; sons and brothers as devoted as Lamb; statesmen as worthily ambitious as Fox; materialists as dogmatical as La Meltrie,—or, probably, Nothingarians as blank as anybody.

That only is progressive philosophy which, instead of exhorting men to fellow those ends they have already determined to follow, or, what is quite as useless, to follow those they have determined not to follow, instructs them how they may more effectually attain whatever end it suits them to pursue. It is, says Macaulay, very justly, on the pedestal of Bacon, not of Epicuras, that those noble lines should be inscribed

O, tenebris tantis tam clarum extollere lumen
Qui primus potuisti, illustrans commoda vitae.

It is in proportion as people learn how to get what they want, that they come to feel sensuality is suicidal and worldliness unsatisfactory. This is the substitution of savoir faire for morality; and therefore Oscar Wilde is right when he remarks in his instructive little book "Intentions," that an age of material progress is always one of spiritual awakening, but an age of direct spiritual culture one in which art is barren, literature feeble, and the prevailing habits grossly, stupidly selfish.

The great characteristic phenomenon of modern civilization is increasing use of the inductive method, which aims to acquire, by the only possible process, that power to do something which alone proves mastery of truth. We have just shown that the method itself is the great cultivator of the individual mind; that instructor which teaches men how they can attain their ends, and, in so doing, teaches them what ends are not worth attaining. Among ends clearly necessary is protecting ourselves against the aberrations of degenerate individuals. In previous articles I have endeavored to show inductively the futility of cruel governmental methods for this purpose. But upon this generalization there comes an important rider—viz.: that no degenerate is useless when considered as a study of human nature.

I was strongly impressed with this truth the other day' when reading, in the "Police Gazette" a possibly authentic account of the lynching of the murderous Bender family. It does not seem to me very useful to say that we should not be angry with criminals because their crimes are the result of circumstances. Our anger is equally so. "Master," said 'a slave, whom Zeno had caught pilfering, "you know fate ordained that I should steal." "True," replied the philosopher, "and that I should whip you for stealing also." That is the pre-Baconian style of philosophy, which equally proves any thing. But it is a reason against giving way to anger that we can learn something from the degenerate.

"The worst use you can put a man to," said John Wilkes "is to hang him." In a rude state of society, I admit that the Benders could scarcely be put to a better. That is, in such a state, they were simply good for nothing; and in such states such branches of the great tree Igdrasil are promptly pruned, away. But in so civilized a society as this, when charity fosters degeneracy, and science investigates its laws, the Benders were surely well worth keeping alive for specimens.

It is unnecessary to point out that theology, whose assumptions are wholly reactionary, and its methods purely rhetorical, is the institution principally opposed to substitution of savoir faire for morality, the chief nurse of "fanatic rage and ignorant revenge."

Concerning Some of the Compulsory Moralists.

While Mr. Gerry is amusing himself baiting baby pianists, the other amateur reformers are not idle. One and all, they are busy spreading the cult of the "nasty-nice." Macmonnies' statue has been sent back in disgrace from Boston—Oh, Phil Hale!—because she had no clothes on. It is at once sad and laughable.

The "nasty-nice" is behind all these movements—the Gerry, the Comstock, the Miss Willard war against tights, and all the rest of them. Most of us see nothing corrupting in a woman—unhusked from her petticoats—as God made her. And to us there is something very unpleasant in the prurient shudder of these nasty-nice people, who pretend to believe that women—like mermaids—end at the waist.

It is curious that women, and women, too, like Lady Henry Somerset and Frances Willard, who are supposed to be working for the enfranchisement of their sex, should take the lead in this attempt to shut their sisters in the old cloistral convention.

If they really wish that women should attain equality with men, the sooner this notion that there is any special obscenity in female flesh is scotched the better. A male acrobat, stripped to the buff, is considered no more indecent than a racehorse. Is there not something very prurient in setting the female of the human race apart as an animal too libidinous and obscene to be looked at? I think there is.—"The Playgoer," in "The Drama" department of the "Musical Courier."

Sociologic Lesson. No. XXXXIII.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

THE RIGHT TO WORK. A man living alone has manifestly the right to exercise his faculties in productive labor. But this confers upon him no right to require from others opportunities or work. He has a right to voluntarily co-operate with others, but no right to demand that others should co-operate with him. Voluntary co-operation requires each party to furnish to the other sufficient inducement to co-operate with him. In wage labor, the workman agrees to work for a compensation so small as to furnish this inducement; and it is his own fault or misfortune if he cannot make his labor worth the compensation he asks for. In co-operative labor, each individual admitted to labor in the corporation, must be able to make his labor worth to the corporation enough to warrant his being received as an associate. Every attempt to enforce the employment of workmen, involves infringement upon the rights of others, and tends to prevent co-operation.

The individual right to work does not meet the wants of a man who can not work, or whose work will not provide him with a living. He can only ask as a bounty, not claim as a right. A bounty assumes that others are able to produce a surplus. Under social reorganization, that surplus will be ample for all who show themselves worthy to share it. Unfortunately those who most need to share it, are too much inclined to make unjust and irritating demands, thwarting their own needs.

REMARKS.

First. Yes. Under equal opportunity "each individual must be able to make his labor worth to the corporation enough to warrant his being received as an associate," but if opportunities are rendered unequal by monopoly of nature's wealth, or by monopoly of the accumulations of past ages of co-operative labor, then the corporation has no right to sit in judgment upon the landless and moneyless applicant for work, and say what he shall receive for his work—or starve.

Second. Under a just distribution of the "surplus" left to each generation by its predecessors there would be enough to enable all—except idiots or the incurably imbecile, to be self-supporting. Hence there would be little need of "bounty," under the reign of Justice. M. H.

One or Many Loves.

BY E. B. FOOTE, JR., M. D.

Mr. Ruedebusch, in his late work, "The Old and the New Ideal," severely criticises the "free unions" of free lovers as failures, and offers as one reason this proneness for one to fall out of love before the other, and the great difficulty of effecting a fair settlement of economic relations, besides the greater difficulty of reconciling the discarded partner to resignation and a gracious acceptance of the freedom of choice. (p. 129). "All her enthusiasm for the cause of freedom cannot deliver her from the tortures of jealousy, nor make sweet the bitter humiliation of desertion by her lover, of defeat by another woman. An uncontrolable hatred must be the result. In all such cases jealousy proved to be altogether too 'natural' to be overcome by theories." (p. 130.)

This picture by Ruedebusch is a perfect description of just what happened to a very amiable and earnest woman who had written a novel that nearly achieved the distinction of being denied the use of the mails because of its "immoral" advocacy of free love unions. She could not stoically endure the logical and often inevitable result of her theories of love and marriage, and swallow the draught she would recommend to others.

Ruedebusch believes the dread of the tragedy of such separation maintains some free unions after the attracting bond of love is worn threadbare. So he brings forward a new solution of the puzzle—his new ideal. He appreciates the value of a home, and of stability in family relations, regards "the enjoyment of spiritual love as absolutely necessary for the true happiness of every man and woman," and so proposes binding agreements for mutual aid, or comradeship contracts which shall be truly, or faithfully and even irrevocably maintained, while permitting no end of variety in satisfaction of spontaneous love attractions. (80 to 99.)

He admits that in such an association of interests free men and women may willingly bind their liberty in order to gain the greatest possible security for a happy and contented life. (p. 100.) He is aware that the good things of this life cannot be enjoyed without some compromise of liberty, but he fails to particularize what loss of liberty there is in his comradeship contract that permits entire freedom of outside sex association. Let us suppose that the man agrees to furnish the material needs of a home life while the woman agrees to be a good housekeeper. Will it not invalidate the contract if she, being enamored of another Lothario, dines out with him and fails to prepare a dinner for her comrade? Or, will it be fair for him to take his latest flame to a champagne supper, a box at the opera, and have a night off, while his home comrade is tending their baby through the measles, and their home really needs a few extras for comfort that could be had for the cost of his outing?

We will assume that a comradeship contract does not permit of either of these neglects of home life, but can we admit that "free and intimate social intercourse" with others, as proposed by Mr. Ruedebusch, can be enjoyed without impairment of any comradeship contract worthy of the name? He admits that passionate love involves intimate social (as well as eventual sexual) intercourse, (p. 111) and yet says "I can see a great deal of value and beauty in the life companionship and indissoluble family relation as it is generally included in Christian marriage." (p. 104.)

The question then arises as to the possibility of being a good home companion and fulfilling a comradeship contract while exercising no restraint on any and every propensity to follow spontaneous sexual attraction, which, if worthy of even a "varietist's" attention, will involve a good deal of time for "courtship" and intimate social intercourse away from home.

The comradeship contract, or varietist's home life, would often be reduced to a mere co-operative housekeeping with too little of the "value and beauty" of a home companionship to make it deserving of being so-called. Analysis of the word love, home and family will show that they are so intimately related that any one of them in its highest or most satisfactory meaning implies the others that a sexual attraction deserving to be called love disposes one to a pretty constant companionship with its object, and arouses a desire to establish a home and a family with "the heart's desire." If a home be started on the Ruedebusch plan it will last as long as the mutual infatuation, but as soon as one party thereof discovers a new attraction, it will be in danger of disruption with the "severe wounds" (p. 337) which he acknowledges are likely to attend that event.

Many of the failures in marriage of today are due to such disturbing elements, and the fickleness and inconstancy of love; but there must be less chance of breaking up home on this account when the members are disposed to fight shy of, rather than encourage other entangling alliances.

In short, if Mr. Ruedebusch's home-life is to be anything approaching his ideal of what it should be, according to his own admissions, the indulgence of other affinities must be so abridged as to deprive them of the higher delights of love and reduce them to brief satisfaction of lustful desires; while, if the outside attractions are followed so far as to develop the full attributes of love, the home life will be reduced to a mere form of living under the same roof, eating together when both happen to be at home at the same time and possibly renewing more intimate acquaintance if ever both find themselves simultaneously possessed of a little surplus or unexpended energy.

Those who really value and desire the benefits and joys of a life companionship, or even a few consecutive years of family comforts, will generally find it necessary to do more in the way of binding their liberty than Mr. Ruedebusch admits, and include among their deprivations of entire freedom the right to encourage and indulge entangling love alliances that must interfere with the essentials of such a happy and contented home life as he apparently yearns for. Those who value unabridged liberty above all things, and wish to indulge every impulse without reserve, will not talk of the beauties of home-life, or expect to enjoy the fruits of a constant and tender devotion necessary to the formation of a life companionship.

Unfettered liberty has its allurements, and also its disadvantages. Much of natural rights or liberty is yielded in the organization of society, but we thereby obtain more comforts, safety, leisure, (which is liberty of time), and opportunities for the cultivation of new pleasures that are unknown to the savage, the isolated man or the pioneer. People cannot be at liberty to live like pigs and at the same time enjoy the healthfulness of associated life under sanitary laws. A man cannot indulge the primitive liberty to loaf and yet enjoy the fruits of industry—except as a tramp or an inheritor of wealth. A man in business for himself is at liberty to make it pay or neglect it, but can't do both. Liberty, under any circumstances, costs something, and the question always to be met is, whether it be worth the cost, and whether there be not something else in way of comfort, well-being or love that we would prefer at the same price.

The libertarian in love will roam at will in such fields as are accessible to him, enjoy the privilege of satisfying spontaneous impulses and form no burdensome attachments, but when his day is spent and the long, dreary blight of disease settles over him, he must do without the tender hand, the sympathetic word, and unfaltering devotion which comes only to those who have cherished the fond love of a life companion, and built up a true home.

Mr. Ruedebusch proposes that the test for any solution of the serious problems of life and love be settled by asking, "will this increase or diminish the chances of a happy life?" (p. 15). Well, let that settle it, and it is hardly likely that the same solution will be acceptable to all. Some will not be disposed to bind their liberty in any degree, while others will conclude that it is worth while to forego the transitory pleasure of yielding to spontaneous impulses for the sake of "all the comforts of home" and such assurance of permanence as can only be had by avoiding the well known sources of disruption.

He recognizes the possibility of "passionate exclusive love," and even calls it "the ideal enjoyment of love," and if it were a constant, reliable factor, it would, together with his comradeship contract, afford all the basis necessary for a permanent home and family; but he has no faith that the exclusive sexual attraction of two for each other can be lasting, and so he solves the problem by leaving it out of the essentials of his family baggage, and casting it overboard to lessen the burden of his comradeship, though in so doing he takes great chances of endangering its stability.

To reverence the divinity of rust and of corruption--to rivet afresh the chains of tradition and of superstition—to bind the free limbs of living men in the fetters of the past—to turn blind eyes from the light, and deny to thirsty lips the waters of truth —to say to the crowned fool, "You are God's elect," and to the poor, "You are beasts of burden, only not, like other beasts, worthy shelter or fodder"—to cling to falsehood, and to loathe reason;—this is what it is to be "Conservative"!—Ouida.

To Extend Lucifer's Work.

The following letter is self-explanatory:

June 13, 1897.

DEAR MOSES HARMAN,

Admiration for your work and a sense of the need of the world to become more familiar with the teachings of Lucifer, lead me to make a proposal for the extension of the circulation of the paper.

It is that one thousand extra copies should be sent for six months to new names that may be furnished you by the friends of the paper. To provide for this, and at the same time aid you in maintaining your effort, I suggest that a fund of five hundred dollars be raised, of which I pledge myself to give one hundred dollars conditional upon the rest being raised, paying twenty-five dollars for every one hundred dollars of the four hundred dollars asked for. So confident do I feel that the friends of the cause will respond to this suggestion that I anticipate the subscription of two hundred dollars, and now have pleasure in handing you fifty dollars. Cordially yours,

———.

The writer of this letter is well known in, and a heavy contributor to, the Freethought work. He feels that now, even more than ever, is the time to extend Lucifer's circulation and influence. Now when all the frightened forces of conservative self-vaunted "respectability" are working against it, is the time for all those who believe in all-around liberty to show their faith by their works and prove to the world that they do not constitute such a hopeless "minority," after all.

This is the very best way to extend Lucifer's work. True, much of the seed will fall on barren ground; but some of our most earnest workers have been gained in just this way.

If you are able to send money for any number of subscriptions, but cannot think of names of people who would read the paper, do not hesitate because of that fact. Every cent you send will be credited on the subscription of some one who may become interested.

Others may be unable to send much money, but can give us names of people worth saving. We urge such to send the names along. Many can be supplied with the surplus before mentioned.

We shall be pleased to publish the list of subscribers to this fund, with the number of subscriptions sent in by each.

Colonization on a Large Scale.

At this writing, June 17, there is in progress, here in Chicago a convention, or series of meetings, that promises important results. For some months plans have been in preparation for inaugurating a co-operative scheme which embraces nothing less than the control of an entire state or territory in its interest, and the establishment of a "co-operative commonwealth."

At the head of this movement is Eugene V. Debs, President of the "American Railroad Union," whose name is doubtless familiar to all our readers. In reply to a request from the New York "Journal" for "particulars in reference to the work to be undertaken by the movement proposed to launch at Chicago in June," Mr. Debs telegraphed an article to that paper, from which we glean that "The most popular feature of the plan, especially with the unemployed, is that proposing the colonization of some western state presenting the best advantages, securing political control under the forms of law, and establishing within the limitations of the federal jurisdiction the co-operative commonwealth. A singular spectacle is presented in the malevolent opposition to this part of the movement, which comes almost wholly from those who sneer at the unemployed as 'tramps and loafers' and yet are now wrought into a frenzy at the mere suggestion that this element is to remove and sequestrate in some distant and uninhabited part of the country. . . . .

"Now as to the plans for establishing the new order of things. First of all, thorough organization on progressive lines will be required and this is well under way in many sections. The movement contemplates the unification of all workers, organized and unorganized, and all others, regardless of sex and color, who favor a change in our social and industrial affairs and believe it can be brought about only by a complete change in our social and industrial system. A constitution, brief and to the point, will be adopted and a declaration of principles issued. A corps of competent organizers will be at once placed in the field and local branches will be instituted in every state in the union. Experience has taught that there is nothing weaker than organized ignorance. From the very beginning, powerful educational influences will be set in operation."

The first meeting of the convention was held at Handel Hall, on Tuesday morning the 15th, which is reported to have been well attended. In the afternoon Mr. Debs outlined his plan in an address delivered in Uhlich's Hall, to one hundred and eighteen delegates, as reported by the "Chronicle." In part Mr. Debs said:

"I am not here to denounce capital nor to find fault with the rich. It is not with the individual I have to do, but with a condition which makes his existence possible. . . . A new dispensation is at hand. We have no miracle to give men food and clothing. The new dispensation means work, but it comes with a promise that will ultimately usher in the co-operative commonwealth. We are here to deal with an issue. We are also here to select a salubrious climate and a good soil that may be found in a number of the states. There are hundreds of letters inviting us to come to different sections and some from governors of states. This movement means hard work and moral and physical courage of the highest order. Let the battle cry be ever, 'Work for the unemployed.' Here and now I declare my enlistment in the cause of 'work for the unemployed.' An organization is the first thing in order, and not a day is to be lost in perfecting this."

A big meeting is to be held Friday the 18th, at which the result of the executive meetings will be announced and a more perfect organization effected.

The result of this meeting will be anxiously looked for by thousands of the unemployed, not only in this country but doubtless in all lands where the English language is read or spoken.

The Everlasting "Servant" Question.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

If I am acquainted with myself I am not, naturally, of a belligerent disposition, but there is one little word which, more than any other I can just now think of, always arouses my antagonism, and makes me want to strike right out from the shoulder at that phase of our social system which is responsible for its existence. That is the word "Servant." Servant! While not so frankly brutal as "slave," could there be in seven letters a more complete denial of the boasted brotherhood claimed by Christianity, a more contemptuous flinging away of the ideal of cosmopolitan comradeship? We all must eat if we live; we must all wear clothes which must be made and kept clean; we all like to have our rooms made fresh and beautiful. Why is not this class of work as respect-worthy as any other? Why must the woman who performs such labor for compensation be considered degraded thereby?

In a woman's paper I recently read an article containing advice to the young housekeeper, concerning the proper management of her "servants." In the first place, the writer says the "mistress" must be very careful to explain all the duties required of the "servant," but naively adds, "At the same time be sure always to add a saving clause such as 'all kinds of housework' to cover any little details which may have escaped your attention." My advice would be that as the "saving clause" includes everything, the mistress might better omit the specification of duties preceding it, and thus save her breath. People sometimes die for want of breath and such important members of the community as "mistresses" should not needlessly waste theirs.

Of course the "servant" should have no desire for human companionship. She must be taught to keep to her "place," and masculine admiration is not for such as she. She must not receive her friends in the kitchen. "In very, very exceptional cases this may be permitted, but it is much wiser to make the rule that one's servants shall see their male visitors at their own homes or on their 'evenings out.'" As an illustration of the practical working of this rule, take the case of a young friend of mine. She found herself obliged to earn her own living, and came to Chicago for that purpose. She had received no training in any occupation other than that of housekeeper. In that line she was proficient, having had the care of her invalid mother's household for a number of years. She worked as a "servant" in Chicago families. Her "mistresses" commented on her unusual intelligence and reliability, but treated her as if she was on this earth merely for their accommodation. She was introduced to me by a mutual friend in another city. When I asked her to attend meetings, etc., she said she could not, as she had only one evening out in two weeks, and was then expected to be in at ten o'clock.

Here is some more advice. In order to follow it the "mistress" must be a sneak and a spy. Our mentor says: "I set regular 'dust-traps' for all my new housemaids and I catch them invariably if they attempt to shirk their work. A stray rose-leaf tucked away under a rug or a table-cover will betray the secret of superficial dusting."

And how is this for the very quintessence of snobbery? "To look up to those they fancy above them seems the natural instinct of their class. And be sure they will not look up to a mistress whom they see performing tasks that they regard as menial."

Women are all the time complaining of their "servants;" but until they learn to treat them as intelligent human beings, with sensibilities, rights and liberties equal to their own, they may expect to have household help of only the lowest grade of intelligence.

The Malthusian Theory.

BY W. N. SLOCUM.

Mr. R. B. Kerr, in Lucifer of May 26, correctly states the Malthusian theory, and is right also in asserting that investigations of scientists since the time of Malthus fully confirm the truth of his theory, so far as it applies to increase of plants, animals and the lower orders of mankind; but there is one important consideration of which Malthus had no conception, and it is one which materialists generally are incapable of conceiving: It is that when man reaches a high state of development a new law intervenes which in great measure nullifies the law of natural increase theretofore prevailing. The order of development is first, physical; second, intellectual; third, moral; fourth, spiritual—perfection, of course, not yet having been reached in either of these divisions.

During the period of intellectual development the rate of increase in progeny begins to lessen, but being clearly traceable to contracepts, such decrease of progeny proves nothing against the truth of the Malthusian theory. When, however, mankind begins to develop spiritually, the number of progeny decreases not from artificial preventives, but from natural causes—a result of the high order of development reached. The laws of nature are as potent in the spiritual realm as they are in the material. The animal brings forth after its kind, multiplying on the animal plane. The spiritual reproduces the spiritual; that is, it gives birth to thought, wisdom, love, sympathy, unselfishness, and other attributes of the spirit. The desires of the spiritual man are not the same as are those of the animal man; therefore it is perfectly in accordance with natural law that, as man progresses, the ratio of increase will decline, and ultimately, when mankind become spiritualized, there will be on earth, as it is said there is in heaven, no marriage—at least no carnal results of marriage.

I do not assert that facts sufficient to prove the theory I advance are yet attainable, but, reasoning from analogy, it is fair to conclude that the Malthusian theory, now so generally accepted, will eventually be laid on the shelf as a "back number." Until that time comes the development of the resources of the earth and the means of transportation of earth's products to any part thereof will keep pace with the increase of population, so no one need become an advocate of war, or a friend of famine in order to check the natural increase of the human family. There will always be sustenance sufficient on earth for all the children of earth. Nature makes no mistakes.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXXIII.

Neither of the men could quite understand the last words that passed between the girls, but Norman understood enough to know that whatever might be their meaning no ignoble subject would be thus discussed. Lawrence Westcot shook his head, but trusted. He was beginning to find these girls very trustworthy. Only Osmond felt as if standing upon some unseen brink. Hilda's enthusiastic words and manner had not been clear to him. He had caught the words but not their full import, and yet—what was it she had been saying about womanhood being sacrificed? of being "bartered"? Had she meant that marriage necessitated such sacrifice? But surely, surely she had not meant that a child could be welcome without the marriage blessing?—a child outside the sacred fold of wedlock? In a dazed manner his hand went up to his head. "Here you can become acquainted with the sentiments that fill your mother's heart and soul, and find a reflection in every word uttered by your sister." As with a red hot iron the words seemed burned into his very soul. These his mother's sentiments? This his sister's religion? His eyes rested upon the faces of the girls; a sweet purity was reflected upon each while Hilda appeared surrounded with a halo. Some strong impulse drew him closer to them; he felt uplifted, borne upward, floating in cloudy mists—a feeling of widening, expanding, filled his being until the words of Hilda again came surging in his ears, "we may not even welcome a child to our arms when we desire it unless we have first permitted our freedom to be shackled, made a barter of our womanhood for that of motherhood, thereby turning the precious boon into a bitter curse." Blank horror made his blood run cold; he felt as if an icy hand was clutching at his throat.

"What is it? are you not feeling well?" Imelda asked the question and Edith's soft warm hands gently pushed him into the nearest chair, handing him a drink of ice water. She understood perfectly well what it was that ailed him, and feared they might have repelled him, so much that he would not again seek their presence. So with her ready woman's tact she led the conversation to other subjects. Music and art, the beautiful in general, were discussed, and finally a request was made that Cora should sing again ere they parted for the night. She surprised them by singing a hymn. But all understood there was a meaning underlying the usual import of the words, "We shall know each other better when the mists have rolled away."

It was with very mixed feelings that the good nights were spoken, and as Hilda's hand for a moment lay in Westcot's a look from his dark eyes flashed into hers, a look that sent the warm blood in a glow to her face, flooding it to the very roots of her hair. Accompanied by the two young men, Norman and Osmond, the sisters were rapidly driven home, the pressing invitation "to come again," still ringing in the boy's ears; and when at the door of the home of this sister pair Hilda also held out her hand to Osmond asking him to call there. After a moment's hesitation he placed his hand in hers and promised.

Days and weeks had again sped on, each day bringing its own events and lessons. The summer's sunshine had changed to the glow of autumn, and just as marked had been the changes with many of our friends. More firm had become the bond of friendship and love that bound them together, more clearly defined—because more clear the ideas and ideals that formed the central attraction around which love and friendship clustered; day by day they understood each other better, and also themselves better, and their lives became purer, higher, nobler.

But still they were waiting, waiting. They recognized that their work was not yet done, but pulses beat higher, eyes shone brighter, smiles more radiant, as they were learning the old, old story over again. At least several of our charming circle were being blessed with that experience. Lawrence Westcot's heart was once more drinking in the lessons of love, and his nature was broadening and expanding under its influence, while Hilda seemed almost glorified, as she moved about, soft snatches of song dropping from her lips. Edith was almost as happy, sunning herself in the reflection of her sister's new found ove. Alice also saw and was happy. The old child-like merriment had returned and the rooms resounded with merry jests and silvery, tinkling laughter.

One evening when Alice had surprised Norman in the gloaming she had not been able to resist the longing, yearning spirit. Creeping up behind him her little snowflake hands had closed his eyes. Ere he had caught the meaning of it a pair of warm dewy lips had been pressed to his. Then she would have fled, but quick as lightning her hands were made prisoners and, despite the desperate struggles of the furiously blushing little woman, she was drawn into the circle of light where Norman in a most wicked manner enjoyed her dire confusion. But presently drawing her to him and enfolding her in his arms he whispered,

"Now for revenge!" The drooping mustache brushed her face and for a little while Alice felt herself smothered; so sweet, so clinging, so really in earnest were the kisses which were pressed upon her lips, and when a few minutes later she came flying into the presence of Imelda, who had both the little girls standing at her knees trying to teach them some object lesson, the young instructress looked up in some surprise at the dishevelled figure. The fair hair was tossed and its owner was pressing both hands to her flaming cheeks. Ere Imelda could frame the question that was trembling upon her lips Alice had sank beside her on her knees and hid her face in her lap.

"Don't say a word," she whispered, "until you have heard what I have to say," and drawing the dark head down so that she could place the rosy lips to her ear, she hurriedly whispered a few sentences and then drew back to watch the effect. Imelda's face betrayed nothing; she only placed her arm about her friend's neck and for a few moments laid her face upon the fluffy hair, then after kissing her repeatedly she said, with a sweet smile:

"I believe it is about time that these little folks received their evening meal and then to bed. So, for a little while I must beg to be excused."

An hour later as Imelda was standing in the embrasure of a window, a manly head bent above her; an arm tenderly drew her head to be pillowed on his breast while the whispered words, "My own, my best beloved," caused her own heart to beat in answering throbs and a sigh of sweet contentment parted her lips.

Only Edith, in those days of pure happiness, wore a look in the dark eyes that portrayed a something hidden in their fathomless depths, a far-away dreamy look that spoke of hopes not yet realized. Sometimes when no eye was looking a suspicious moisture would gather in the dark wells and for a while would dim their glorious luster, but not for long. Where there was so much warmth of heart and joyousness of spirit it was not possible that one whose life had been so practical would cast a shadow upon the bright faces around her.

There was yet one other whose happiness consisted in dreaming of the future and waiting hopefully and patiently what it might possibly bring, and that other was Cora. But not in idleness was she waiting. He should not have reason to think that she had wasted precious time; so she had studied on. Not only studied but already she was using her talents to advantage. As soon as she was strong enough she had insisted on doing something to be self-supporting, and through the aid of her friends she had been successful in obtaining quite a class of music pupils, foremost among whom was Meta who gave promise of future wonders. One hour in the early morning, however, found her with another pupil, and that pupil was Imelda. Much as she desired it Imelda had not hitherto found the time and opportunity to apply herself to this study, for which she possessed a talent that surpassed even that of Cora, whose music had settled in her throat rather than at the ends of her fingers. More than once Cora had said:

"Not long till you must have a more competent teacher." Thus the sisters daily grew more close together with an appreciation of sisterly love in their hearts such as is rarely known by those who have been cuddled in the lap of fortune since their infancy.

But there was still another—another growing daily in light, in breadth and in intelligence. Osmond Leland had returned again, and yet again, to the charmed circle and was, as it were, born into a new life. And as, day by day, he better understood the sweet purity of these girls, so also did the events in connection with his old life stand out in glaring contrast. To his sorrow and dismay he found, upon close investigation, that his father's life was neither pure nor truthful. Contrasted with the pure nature-love and poetic beauty displayed in every word spoken by these new friends the coarse and lewd jests indulged in by his father and his companions could not fail of effect. It was but a short time until he felt his soul revolt at their ribaldry. More and more he felt himself attracted and, still more often he found himself seeking the society of the coterie of fair girls who each in turn imparted their ideals and dreams to the susceptible young heart, so eloquently that it went out to each and all in answering throes, and at the same time there was born in that heart a secret yearning and longing for the mother and sister who were as strangers to him. Often when he sought the Westcot home at an earlier hour in the day he had the, to him, rare pleasure of a romp with Alice's baby daughters. Norma would clap her chubby hands and scream with delight, while Meta's dark eyes would glow and sparkle. But while Norma, with all a baby's delight of pulling her victim's hair would soon tire, and was content to cuddle up in his lap where she would often fall asleep, Meta would softly steal up behind and take possession of him in a more gentle manner. Her soft little fingers had a peculiarly tender touch as she patted his cheek and toyed with his hair, arranging the blonde curls into a mass of ringlets. She would thus keep her fingers busy for a hour or more, and never seemed to tire. The dark eyes would have the same glad sparkle at the end as at the beginning, and Osmond seemed to enjoy the performance as well as the little ones. On several occasions he had stretched himself out upon the carpet when the serious bright-eyed sprite would lift the fair head and pillow it in her lap and while toying with his hair would put him to sleep. This would afford her extreme pleasure. She would not permit anyone so much as to whisper while she guarded his slumber.

The young mother and her girl friends watched the play with amusement and pleasure. Was there already a spark of the future woman in the little child's heart?

VARIOUS VOICES.

Blenda Palm Reynolds, Lawrence, Kan.:—"Hilda's Home" is just splendid; many ideas are advanced therein that are new to some readers. I think it an excellent way to show your doctrines put into practice. So many people confound free love with free lust. Enclosed find one dollar to apply on our subscription. With kindest regards to yourself and daughter Lillian.

Blanche F. Wright, Austin, Tex.:—Your papers have done more for me than anything I have ever read. O how good it is to know that others dare breathe the sweet air of freedom for which I long. I dare not come out boldly for the principles you declare. When I leave here I shall cast behind me all the old miserable ties that have made me a slave. Please send me some copies of your paper for distribution. Sometimes I think, "God made woman, and then forgot all about her!" O, to be at work for the world. My whole being thrills at the thought.

Oscar Johnson, San Francisco, Calif.:—I am glad you kept on sending Lucifer although I requested you not to—on account of hard times. I am more than pleased with your bright and entertaining paper and wish you all possible success. "Hilda's Home" is a beautiful story, well told and if it is ever printed in book form put me down for one copy. The change in Lucifer is a sensible one and I like it ever so much better than the old way. I inclose herewith one dollar for one year of Lucifer. Of "Our New Humanity" I have received the January number and as I see the April number will soon be forthcoming, may I ask you to send me No. 1 of Vol. II. and No. 4 of Vol. I. Send also No. 643 Lucifer which is missing. Wish I could order some more literature but will have to wait till I am struck by the long delayed Prosperity.

[We have still a supply of back numbers, both of Lucifer and "Our New Humanity," which we will send post paid to all applicants. To those who wish copies for distribution special rates are given. M. H.]

Mrs. A. Carter, Rutland, Vermont:—Inclosed I send you three months trial subscription for Lucifer and the three books advertised. Have wanted to read your paper for some time as I am much interested in all matters pertaining to the sexes. We greatly need a reform in this matter. Many are held together in worse than the chattel slavery of long ago. I would like to become a worker in this reform, for it is much needed. Angels speed you in your work, and may they hasten the time when women shall have the right to choose their own companion when, from false education they make an error in their choice and then, when too late, are obliged by man-made laws to suffer the tortures of hell, if I may use the word.

R. Y. Bach, New York City:—While writing about matters pertaining to reforms advocated by Lucifer, I will state first that, although a married man I do not regard with favor the legal ceremony of marriage by priest or magistrate. With twelve years of matrimonial experience I would wish for celibate freedom again, but business relations and health considerations oblige me to still "keep up married appearances" and to suffer philosophically.

I am bound down—in bondage—"in the bonds of matrimony" as the certificate truly states. . . .

I wish to speak of a young woman whom I've known several years, who "likes me more than a little" yet has another whom she sincerely loves. She wishes to live with him to make a home and bear children, without being married. To show my approval of this contract, I have offered a present of twenty-five dollars down and another twenty-five dollars to be paid in less than a year providing they do not yield to Old Mother Grundy and have a legal ceremony performed. We three have discussed the matter fully, and the prospect seems very hopeful of seeing the conjugal union in freedom (and therefore happiness) of another young couple.

To meddlers, the lady (even now) will exhibit a plain gold ring, such as married slaves usually wear; while to relatives and others who believe in a legal ceremony she will turn a cold shoulder, and the seclusion in a large city like New York will perfect the mutual agreement to love but not to wed.

S. R. Shepherd, Leavenworth, Kan.:—Many people, unable to grasp an idea and proof and logic, readily yield to material demonstration. Fifty years ago a German farmer near Adrian, Mich., bitterly opposed plank roads but having to drive on one a few miles was converted by his horses stopping and looking back inquiringly when he drove off into the mud. The Leavenworth, Kansas, "Times" always opposed Lucifer and marriage reform but approvingly publishes an attractive account of a couple who after years of wedded unhappiness got divorced and are dwelling together in perfect bliss. It says:

"The couple have not had a sign of trouble since the divorce, although they were in hot water for thirty-two years fretting under the marital yoke. They dare not quarrel now for fear one will leave the other in the lurch. He must have his meals and she must have a home. They are as happy now as if they had never been married. The bargain promises to last to the end."

Object lessons like this cannot fail to convince the most prejudiced and dull of comprehension.

[From the "Journal" of May 31, a leading Republican daily of Kansas City, Mo.—a copy of which some friend has kindly sent us—we learn that the above mentioned parties live in San Diego, Calif. The significant feature in this case is, not so much the fact that marriage is proved a failure when compared to freedom, but that conservative dailies like the Leavenworth

"Times" and the Kansas City "Journal," approvingly call attention to the movement for the abolition of what the great English philosopher, Mill, calls the only slave system now recognized in law, viz.: The enslavement of women in marriage. The editors of these journals are to be congratulated for their courage. M. H.]

LOVE, MARRIAGE, AND DIVORCE

And the Sovereignty of the Individual.

A Discussion between Henry James, Horace Greely, and Stephen Pearl Andrews. There are here included the final replies of Mr. Andrews, refused by the New York Tribune, and a subsequent discussion, occurring twenty years later, between Mr. James and Mr. Andrews.

"The great lesson for the world to learn is that HUMAN BEINGS DO NOT NEED TO BE TAKEN CARE OF. What they do need is such conditions of justice and freedom and friendly co-operation that they can take care of themselves. Provided for by another, and subject to his will as the return tribute, they pine, and sicken, and die. This is true equally of women as of men: as true of wives as it is of vassals or serfs. Our whole existing marital system is the house of bondage and the slaughter-house of the female sex. Whether the evils are inherent or incidental, whether they belong to the essence or the administration of the institution, whether they are remediable without or only by means of revolution, are the questions that now have to be discussed."

Determination.

Be firm. One constant element in luck
Is genuine, solid, old Teutonic pluck,
See yon tall shaft! It felt the earthquake's thrill,
Clung to its base, and greets the sunrise still.

Stick to your aim; the mongrel's hold will slip,
But only crowbars loose the bull-dog's grip;
Small as he looks, the jaw that never yields
Drags down the bellowing monarch of the fields.

Yes, in opinions look not always back;
Your wake is nothing, mind the coming track.
Leave what you've done for what you have to do;
Don't be "consistent," but be simply true.

Anarchism and Individualism.

BY C. L. JAMES.

This article was originally meditated only as a reply to "Matadore." But it seems to me this Spanish gentleman (who does not understand Spanish) has raised some questions worthy more impersonal treatment; so I shall "let him slide" as often as convenient. "Matadore" has mistaken his vocation. He is a picadore. He has stirred up the bull; but he has made no attempt to kill it; and his boast, all through, is only that he can stir the animal up more if necessary. Well, then! to business.

"Sodden he stops; his eye is fixed: away,
Away, thou heedless boy! prepare thy spear
Now is thy time to perish, or display
The skill that yet may check his mad career."

"Matadore" says I see "no station between law-enforced marriage" and "prostitution-variety." If "Matadore" has read my recent articles in Lucifer, he knows better. Webster defines prostitution as "The act or practice of offering the body to an indiscriminate intercourse with men." Voluntary intelligent variety is not indiscriminate. Nothing ever makes a woman prostitute herself, according to Webster's definition, but instituted force. I showed, in a very recent article, that prostitution-variety was the oldest of positive institutions; and that marriage, whether polyandrous, polygamous, or monogamous, is only a modification, which, as people advanced in humanity, became necessary to preserve prostitution-variety from extinction. "Matadore's" questions would be more intelligible if he began by killing some of his own "bulls." But such as they are, I will take them seriatim.

1. Have Individualists the right to co-operate against real criminal invasion? Let Individualists answer. I may well despair of defining their rights, since they cannot do it themselves. Individualism sprang from Anarchism, as shadow springs from light. The torch of Anarchism was kindled and fed, in the last century, by Edmund Burke, "Junius," Thomas Paine, Condorcet, Mary Wollstonecraft, William Godwin. Among those it early illuminated was Thomas Jefferson, in whose works may repeatedly be found the plainest declaration that men would do best to dispense with any form of government. But since men were too stupid to immediately think so, Jefferson, instead of consistently laboring to clear away their superstition, attempted, in the true spirit of a "practical" politician, to give them as little government as possible." He accepted the highest office; and impelled by his evil genius, went on to such transparent encroachments as the Louisiana Purchase. Through these coquettings with the harlot of Authority, he established the best claim of any man to be the father of that bastard Anarchism to which the name of Individualism has been given. The experience of this greatest among Individualists, illustrates that of all who ramble into such bye and forbidden paths. The pons asinorum of Anarchism is that no one takes the trouble to govern for nothing—that government is "invasion"—that it is never instituted but by those who want to "invade"—that those who imagine they institute it for their mutual protection are just these many fools whom the few knaves must have in order to do business. If an Individualist cross this Asses' Bridge, verily he shall become an Anarchist. If he cross it not, now that has grown so easy, of a truth he shall abide—a jackass. Let the intelligence, freedom, consistency, courage, vigor, of those on the two sides witness whether this be so. Individualism is a mongrel, artificially bred, and unable to propagate. Anarchism is a new species, produced by natural selection, and constantly putting forth varieties. Individualism is an artificial pond, requiring to be daily dredged and banked. Anarchism is a fountain, whose ever-flowing heads have already fertilized a hundred intellectual deserts.

2 and 3. These questions properly go with 1, but 3 is interesting, as tending to show that "Matadore" would "imprison the Good Samaritan for a witness, and release the thieves on bail."

4. When a criminal is dangerous enough to require restraint I am in favor of restraining him in an asylum. Otherwise I would let him go.

5. The asylum should be paid for by those who think it benefits them. I am happy to suggest here a "practical" method. What's the matter with those who prosecute paying a fee for this purpose? Don't, don't, "Matadore" reply that a poor man might not be protected; or I shall certainly think you "a victim of weak hereditary organization."

6 and 7. Give it up—don't understand the lingo.

8 and 9. Parents owe everything to their children; children nothing to their parents. The father's responsibility is greater and more binding than the mother's.

10. Should a woman have help from others to make the father of her children do his duty by them? Certainly not. Things will never be right till women learn not to rely on papa-government, but on their own choice in men.

11. The age of consent is a transparent preposterous humbug. There is no reason why parents should ever cease to protect their children, while the children themselves desire it; and, again to be "practical," it should under the existing system, be a simple question of fact for the jury whether the girl in a rape case did consent intelligently or not.

One or Many Loves.

BY E. B. FOOTE, JR., M. D.

J. Wm. Lloyd has a different ideal, which he presented in Lucifer 649. Here is a "glimpse of the new family of the future. Around each pair of central lovers, by the most natural laws of affinity and magnetism, will gather a group of side lovers, loving the central lovers, and each other because of that love. What a beautiful family that would form, what sympathy, what friendship! . . . . Families in this system will become so mingled that society will be like an interwoven garment . . . . and the great Federation of Man become an accomplished fact."

It is unbecoming to smile when earnest, hopeful comrades tell their "irridescent dreams," but with our observation of humanity, we should say that this dream is simply "out of sight"—too heavenly for earthly use—a million years away—except that the dreamer claims to have observed "that it is possible to love several at the same time, to love one person supremely and several others at the same time truly, and for mutual harmony to prevail throughout the entire group of lovers thus related." This experience was indeed some proof of the possibility of Lloyd's family, but were we to ask "how many?" "how long?" "what results?" probably the replies would prove that the experiment was merely "a glimpse," and that the lasting and other essential elements of a family were not in evidence.

The Oneida Community came nearer to being a fairly successful experiment in that direction than any other among modern civilized people, except that there the formation of supreme central loves was discouraged, or interdicted, as not in harmony with the heavenly state in which all should love all without preferences, and there should be no marrying or giving in marriage. In spite of the power of their dominant religious teaching to hold many persons for many years in one large family where everything was held in common and exclusive passionate attractions were forbidden as unholy, these did gradually develop among those of the first generation there born, and were the main cause of the decline and fall of that heavenly estate.

The uncertainty of passionate exclusive attractions upsets the most careful calculations of the practical sociologist, and spoils the air-castles of the irridescent dreamers. In earthly life the stability of marriage is endangered by the lack of durability of exclusive attraction, while in heaven, where it is ruled out, it is liable to be a disturbing element if souls are born again with a complete outfit corresponding to the image of God and Man.

In Lucifer, No. 655, Mr. Walker admits that "many natures have the craving for a central love, but it is equally true that other natures do not," and he pictures in quite highfalutin language the delights of love in freedom as enjoyed by the varietists who have several attractions and no particular preferred creditors.

So long, however, as the varietist is influenced in his choice by some selective opportunity, Walker does not regard him as promiscuous. It is no doubt this kind of love animus pervading the selective varietist of which Mr. Walker writes the following: "Love in freedom inspires to most strenuous endeavor; it electrifies the pen of the poet, the brush of the painter, the chisel of the sculptor, and it transforms into gladly-preferred service toil that is lowly and grimy and weary." We have seen love work all these wonders where it has but one object, one god to whom all devotion of spirit was gladly, spontaneously, unfalteringly rendered; and love has even done great work along these lines when one god or idol has been substituted for another in varying intervals, but was there ever an instance where the butterfly—or common house-fly—quality of sexual attraction was responsible for any inspired creation, continuous, self sacrificing effort, or really unselfish service?

It is very questionable if the supreme delights of the elixir of love, as glowingly pictured by Mr. Walker, can be fully enjoyed by the selective-varietist whose sentiment is "how happy I might be with either, were t'other dear charmer away." The purest, sweetest, highest, most inspiring joys of love necessitate some exclusiveness, which is not wholly satisfied by the seclusion of two corporeal persons, but requires also a mental exclusion of all other images permitting entire devotion, for the time at least, to the immanent ideal. If it be not an exclusive mutual admiration society, abolishing all thoughts of others, the course of true love is not smooth, and the god of love does not bestow supreme unction.

Mr. Ruedebusch would have almost the unanimous vote of humanity for his statement (p. 317) that "the longing for exclusiveness in the highest enjoyment of love is a healthy and natural desire," but far less would say yes to his belief that "the wish to have this continue forever means a morbid craving for the impossible." It is, the majority would say, the straight and narrow road to heaven, along which few are successful in finding their way through life, but the few who do find their ideal personified, their love-god made flesh, may look with more pity than disdain on the varietist who has a few little gods, like beads on his string all the time, and full liberty to add new ones and discard some according to his selective preferences.

Even happier is the lot of one who falls "dead in love" with some beau-ideal and enjoys for a time the delightful inspiration of an all-pervading delusion that the afflatus will last forever, which may occur to one person many times in spite of experiences which prove that human attractions are subject to variation, that ideals may change, that love-worship is often a temporary insanity in which a cure may occur.

Of such love some poet has written "if this be a dream then waking would be pain," but fortunately mercurial human nature doesn't learn too much from experience and is generally susceptible to acquiring new delusions and easily lured by some infatuation that will "let me dream again."

There seems small prospect of success of efforts to devise any new ideal for the regulation of human love relations in a manner that shall insure uniformity and happiness. Several methods or systems have been experimented with from away back, and most of them are continued today for the accomodation of the varying needs of different natures. Exclusiveness, variety and promiscuity have always had and still have their votaries, but the numbers in these different classes of course vary with races and conditions. Personal happiness has not been and cannot be the sole factor by which to judge of what is best for humanity. There can be no individuals to enjoy happiness without due provision for the continuance of the race, and at bottom sex attraction is nature's device for accomplishing this purpose; or to put it in a more natural and rational way, if there ever was a species of sexual animal evolved without imperious sexual attraction it has failed to be perpetuated because of the lack of this essential stimulus to propagation; and should the puritanical ascetics who wish to restrict all sexual relations to purposive propagative acts succeed in converting any considerable number of men and women to their ideal, the normal impulse would be so subdued to a state of indifference and apathy that it would not long suffice for reproduction, and such a class would be reduced to the seedless, infertile state of navel oranges and doomed to extinction almost as surely as the shakers. Mankind has survived many remarkable periods, even eras of extravagant sexual depravity, and though this prodigality may have been mainly responsible for the decadence of some peoples, perversion must be less fatal than repression, and the races in whom the currents of this perpetuating power have been strongest are those that survive. The Jews are a notable example. It is easy to see that the human race tends to extinction, with the practice of either extreme, the repression of sexual attraction to reproductive intents only, or the neglect of reproduction in universal addiction to infertile sexual association.

In the human species the successful raising of progeny requires the devoted care of parents during many years, and the predominance of the monogamic family amongst a great variety of the races peopling the earth today is an evidence that it survives as the fittest form of sexual relation for the conservation and perpetuation of the human race.

[To be concluded.]

Missed the Mark.

BY EMIL P. RUEDEBUSCH.

Dr. Foote's essay, "One or Many Loves," is very well written, but its continuation in Lucifer No. 664 has one great fault,—it misses the mark and hits the wrong man.

I will promptly admit that in most cases under present conditions, "if a home be started on the Ruedebusch plan it will last as long as the mutual infatuation, but as soon as one party thereof discovers a new attraction, it will be in danger of disruption, etc.,"—but my worthy critic has evidently failed to discover the following fact: Ruedebusch's plans are proposed only and exclusively to persons who have fully understood and accepted Ruedebusch's ideal of love. The above quotation proves that Dr. Foote has not tried to understand, nor even to seriously consider this "new ideal" and the changes which it would self-evidently bring about in the "desires of love," hence his present article, however valuable it may be otherwise, is absolutely meaningless as a criticism of my theory.

If Dr. Foote wishes to test, by argument, the value of a certain union of New-Idealists the first condition must be, of course, that the respective parties are New-Idealists. If he wished to claim that the acceptance of the new ideal would make no difference in their feelings and actions, or that it is impossible, then such a claim would be a suitable subject for discussion between us. As it is I see no chance for an argument, and can only hope that some of my friends who call themselves "Varietist-Free-Lovers" will attack him.

Volume of Currency and Price.

BY ALBERT CHAVANNES.

I think, friend Harman, that you made a mistake when you backed down from your first position, that the volume of currency regulates prices. Monopolies and trusts only affect special prices, the average price remains the same. If the Standard Oil Company raises the price of oil, the price of things not monopolized goes down to precisely the same extent that the price of oil went up, and the average remains the same. That is what is going to happen with the coming tariff. The price of protected goods will go up some, and the price of unprotected products will go down. Only as the rise in price will be in special products, and results from causes well understood, it will be noticed, while the fall, being gradual and diffused over a large number of articles, will attract but little attention. However, believers in protection, after a year or two, will find to their great surprise, that times have not improved.

As regards what controls prices, it used to be a favorite argument with the gold men at the beginning of the silver agitation, to say that the fall in prices was due to improvements in production. The fallacy of this argument is easily shown. If today, one man working one day, can make one pair of shoes, and if a farmer can by a day's work raise one bushel of wheat, the price of one pair of shoes and of one bushel of wheat, other expenses being equal, will be the same. If by improvements in methods of production, tomorrow one man can in one day make two pairs of shoes, the price of shoes, as compared with wheat will fall. But, here is what the gold man forgot to mention: The price of wheat as compared with shoes will rise, and the average price remains the same. It is just as impossible for improved methods of production to lower the average of prices, as it is for monopoly to raise all prices.

Price is the name we give to the exchangeable value of products, as measured by the medium of exchange. Individual prices as compared to each other are regulated by improvements in production, monopoly, etc., but the average of prices is regulated by the ratio of product to the amount of currency. To say that monopoly affects prices—meaning the general average—is as foolish as to say that the action of the wind by raising waves, affects the average level of the sea.

If the medium of exchange had not been tampered with by the demonetization of silver, the increased production of currency would have kept pace with the increased production of products, and there would have been no fall in prices, Parkhurst and Borland notwithstanding.

One more explanation may help your readers to understand the present condition of things. Currency fulfils in production, the same function that oil does in machinery. Now, it is a known fact that if a man running machinery requiring one hundred horse power, uses one gallon of oil a day, to keep it running at full speed, if he increase his machinery to the extent that it will require one hundred and twenty-five horse power, he must increase the amount of oil he uses also. If he does not, he can still run, but he must run at a slower rate of speed. The same law holds good in production. If we want to increase production to keep pace with the increase of population, and the development of the country, we must also increase the amount of currency. Just now we are trying to increase production without increasing the amount of money, and the result is just the same as trying to increase the amount of machinery without increasing the amount of oil. Falling prices corresponds to the heating of the journals of machinery, and has the same effect. It increases friction and checks production. And this will go on until the people have learned their lesson.

Sociologic Lesson. No. XXXXIV.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

THROWN OUT OF WORK. When machinery supplants hand labor, although it benefits the community it is a hardship upon those who are thrown out of work, especially if they are unable to obtain other remunerative employment. In the transition there is a large class whom lack of education and improvidence reduce to want. They either will not or can not adapt themselves to the new conditions. There are no individuals or corporations to whom they can justly apply with a demand for relief, either by giving them labor or sustenance. They have fallen by the wayside in the march of progression, and lie unnoticed by the throngs which sweep by them.

Individuals are not responsible to them. The machines which have displaced them can not be appealed to, and they have no rightful claim upon the owners of the machines. Commercially they have no claim whatever. Under the law of development from the survival of the fittest, they have lost their claim as fellow-workers. What remains is the claim of a human being, to be cared for by other human beings; and the proper way to make such care effective is by the action of the whole community. This is one of the recognized functions of government, but very partially fulfilled, to provide for those who cannot provide for themselves.

No adequate remedy has yet been provided in society as it is; but in a properly reorganized society it will be a primary aim to provide sustenance for all, and to provide work for all who desire it.

To Extend Lucifer's Work.

In last week's issue a plan was proposed by an earnest and faithful friend of Lucifer and its work, by which plan it was and is hoped that our paper would reach hundreds and perhaps thousands of new readers. Thinking it probable that many of our friends may have failed to see said letter it is now and here reproduced:

June 13, 1897.

DEAR MOSES HARMAN,

Admiration for your work and a sense of the need of the world to become more familiar with the teachings of Lucifer, lead me to make a proposal for the extension of the circulation of the paper.

It is that one thousand extra copies should be sent for six months to new names that may be furnished you by the friends of the paper. To provide for this, and at the same time aid you in maintaining your effort, I suggest that a fund of five hundred dollars be raised, of which I pledge myself to give one hundred dollars conditional upon the rest being raised, paying twenty-five dollars for every one hundred dollars of the four hundred dollars asked for. So confident do I feel that the friends of the cause will respond to this suggestion that I anticipate the subscription of two hundred dollars, and now have pleasure in handing you fifty dollars. Cordially yours,

———.

For reasons best known to himself the writer of this letter prefers that his name shall not appear, at least not now. Since its publication the following responses have been received:

James W. Adams,	$7.00
Robert Greer, M. D.	1.00
J. M. Crane,	5.00

Believing that there are many more who feel an equal interest in the extension of Lucifer's propaganda we cordially and earnestly invite co-operation in the way indicated by the writer of the above letter. In thus saying we do not wish to dictate as to methods by which co-operative aid shall be extended, but suggest this as one of the very best ways to help on the much needed educational work.

"Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs."

At last, after long waiting we have a supply of this book, the latest publication of the "Legitimation League," whose headquarters are in London, and whose first object, if we do not mistake, under its late reorganization, is "To educate public opinion in the direction of freedom in sexual relationships." This league is not confined to one continent or hemisphere, and at its last annual meeting it did Lucifer the honor of unanimously electing Lillian Harman president of the "League" for the current year.

The author of "Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs" is Mr. Oswald Dawson, formerly a prominent member of the English "Personal Rights Association," of which the paper called "Personal Rights" is the organ. Finding the scope of that organization too limited to suit them, Mr. Dawson and others have organized another association, "The Legitimation League," of which the "Adult" is the official organ, and whose scope and purpose are shown by the books named "Bar Sinister and Licit Love," "Rights of Natural Children," and now by this latest contribution, "Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs"—a very handsomely bound and excellently printed book of sixty-two pages. It contains four full page, well-executed photographs of Ezra Heywood, Lois Waisbrooker, and of Lillian and Moses Harman, with brief sketches of the history of these individuals, and of their connection with radical reform work.

The price of this last named book is twenty cents post-paid, when sent from this office. The price of "Bar Sinister" and of "Rights of Natural Children," is twenty-five cents each, also postpaid. To those who buy for distribution or to sell again, special rates will be given. Believing these to be very important publications and very helpful to Lucifer's propaganda, we solicit large orders from those who may feel able to do missionary work along these much neglected lines.

Debs and the Commonwealth.

The convention of the "American Railway Union" which met in this city on the 15th, to organize the "Co-operative Commonwealth" movement, has concluded its labors and the delegates have returned to their homes. Notwithstanding the ill-concealed hostility of the capitalistic press the proceedings of this convention have been pretty fully reported in most of Chicago's great dailies, and, so far as I have seen, have not been seriously misrepresented. The "Chronicle" of the 22nd gives nearly a two column report of the closing day's proceedings, of which report a few paragraphs are here reproduced:

"Five men whose names were familiar far and wide throughout the period in 1894 when the railroad traffic of the west was paralyzed by a gigantic strike, and who went to jail as the result of that famous labor conflict, were yesterday chosen as the temporary leaders of the Social Democracy of America. The climax of the convention was reached when the count of the almost unanimous vote was completed and the members of the old American Railway union stood in their seats to lead in the thunder of applause that ensued. This is the executive board that will conduct the business of the new order until the national convention in June of next year:

Chairman—Eugene V. Debs.
Vice chairman—William E. Burns.
Secretary—Sylvester Keliher.
Treasurer—Roy M. Goodwin.
Organizer—James Hogan.

"The concluding day's session was busy and at times sensational. Twice Mr. Debs made characteristically impassioned speeches and his expressions evoked furious gusts of applause. Just before adjournment the ardor of the delegates was stirred by the singing of 'Grand Countree' and 'The Marseillaise' by Mrs. Kinsella. The opening chords of the French anthem brought every man to his feet and all stood throughout, joining in the chorus. Previous to this there had been an animated scene when Mrs. H. S. Lake sent to Mr. Debs as he st ood on the platform a bouquet of white peonies, bound with a white ribbon. A man who recollected on the instant the white ribbon of the strike sympathisers of 1894 yelled: 'Hurrah for the white ribbon!' 'Yes, it is a sanctified emblem,' remarked the president, and a storm of applause swept the hall."

The constitution adopted by the convention consists of sixteen sections, the first of which states that, "this organization shall be known as the Social Democracy of America, and its headquarters shall be located in Chicago."

Among the characteristic utterances of M.. Debs, outlining his plans, are the following:

"An impression has obtained that this project is another Coxey movement. It is not so in any sense. We are going to build a community on carefully prepared plans, as any thoughtful man would erect a building. A commission will go first to find the best adapted state for our purpose in soil, climate and natural resources. Then we will prepare plans for the colonization and build a state like a house, with a foundation deep and strong. We shall not fail—as it has been said to us that others have. I want to risk my reputation by declaring that we shall not fail.

"The state of Washington is favorably considered, and it is a good place—upon the coast, where we shall not have to depend upon the railroads. Probably we shall establish the first state co-operative commonwealth there, conducting everything within the limitations of the federal constitution. Ahead of everybody will go farmers to till the soil and sow crops; then fruit orchards will be established, and then stock ranches. We shall have the finest because contributions and pledges are already flowing in. And when we can feed our people we shall start with the establishment of co-operative industries. Shoe factories, clothing factories, one after another, will be built and the material wants of the increasing community be fulfilled. Then the ballot."

By far the largest and one of the most enthusiastic of the series of meetings held in the interest of the "Commonwealth" movement was that at Handel Hall on Sunday afternoon. Mr. Debs himself was not present—being unavoidably detained elsewhere. The large hall was densely packed and the enthusiasm unbounded, called forth by the eloquence of Mr. Thomas Mills, of the "People's University," the business office of which is at 6015 S. Halsted street. Mr. Mills is in hearty sympathy with the Commonwealth move, and seems to be doing excellent work in educating the great masses of people up to the point of seeing the need and the possibility of self-help, instead of looking for aid from "government" and from political leaders or parties.

I have room in this issue only to say that I was very agreeably disappointed on meeting Mr. Debs and hearing him speak. He is no ordinary man, and judging from what I saw and heard, of and from him, he is destined to leave a mark upon the history of this country, such as it has been the fate of very few men to make.

In next issue I hope to have more to say of him, his plans and his helpers.

Volume of Currency Again.

Referring to the article of Albert Chavannes' in this issue I would say:

As to whether there was really a "backing down" from my first position, in the reply to W. P. Borland, in whole No. 658, I will leave others to judge. My position, as I now view the matter, and as I then saw it, though perhaps not well expressed, is,

First, that the money of today is a commodity, bought and sold in the open market, like other commodities. Hence the common phrases, "the money market is tight," "the money market is easy," etc.

Second, that, very naturally, the price of other commodities, when compared with money, depends largely, if not chiefly, upon the volume of money in circulation, or available for purposes of trade or exchange.

Third. Under free trade in, and free production of, all commodities, including money, there would be comparatively little fluctuation of prices. When wheat advances in price, because of scarcity, farmers would turn their attention to wheat raising until the normal equilibrium should be restored. And so likewise of cotton or wool, horses or cattle, or any other staple commodity. And the same of gold and silver, or any other commodity used as money, or as a basis of currency. Scarcity of money, or a money famine, would stimulate production of money until equilibrium should again be restored.

Fourth. Such would be the result of liberty—of free competition among men and their commodities. Such would be the result of equal rights for all and special privileges for none. But our monetary system is a denial of liberty and equality. Our monetary system, our commercial system, our land system, our governmental systems,—one and all,—were not built on the plan of equal rights. Gold and silver money mean the money of aristocracy, of privilege, of inequality. Tariffs, taxes, "legal tenders," etc., all mean the denial of the basic principles enunciated in that legendary document called the Declaration of of Independence. With boundless natural wealth, and with a plethora or overproduction of all the necessaries of life, thousands and millions of people in this country are in sore distress for want of these necessaries; while a small minority of the people are accumulating wealth more rapidly than was ever known in the history of the world.

Why is all this? The answer is short and easy. MONOPOLY! PRIVILEGE! Denial of liberty and equality. The chief agency or means by which this reign of monopoly and privilege is inaugurated or effected is money!—gold standard money.

The remedy, then would seem to be to dethrone gold! Dethrone the money of the privileged classes; reduce all commodities to a level of equality; give all commodities—including the most important of them all, namely, Human Labor, equal right to be made the basis of currency; in other words, give us the plebeian "labor check" instead of the aristocratic Gold Dollar, and we shall have achieved a real independence of the monarchies and aristocracies of Europe,—which never yet has been accomplished—as well as independence from the monarchies and aristocracies of our own home production.

The Martyrdom of Man.

BY JOS. RODES BUCHANAN.

Lucifer has some excellent correspondents, who are apparently real freethinkers—a very rare class—for a huge majority of those who would claim that title are far from free, being still shackled by some remains of the ancient and inherited ignorance, of which I would say a word that seems to be needed.

I refer especially to Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. James.

Sometime ago Mr. Chamberlain used a vigorous and comprehensive expression referring to the condition of public opinion poisoned through and through by the old notions of Jewish and (so-called) Chistian theory, to which I immediately wrote a cordial response, enforcing that idea, which was lost among the manuscript contributions of Lucifer. But the subject is too important to be dropped, so I will try again to condense some suggestions into the narrow limits that are allowable.

Who can live in malaria without being infected? It is a desperate battle for a freethinker to protect himself from the social atmosphere. Even Mr. Harman has not entirely escaped. There is an old notion of modesty—false modesty—imposed by social jealousy, compelling everyone to depreciate himself and ignore his own claims like the pious churchman who grovels before the throne as the vilest sinner on God's foot stool. This is the established fashion for public speakers—self-depreciation—and when I gave Mr. Harman some deserved compliments, he felt bound to decline them as a poor unworthy mortal—though he must know in his interior soul that he is one of the heroes and leaders of freethought, and ought to be able to say so, for all truths should be spoken.

This is a very small matter, but a fair illustration of the pervading debasement of the human mind, coming down the ages for several thousand years from the ancient barbarian ignorance which was most fully expressed in the ancient barbarian theology which has ever debased and absolutely cursed the human race, saturating the whole soul of humanity with malignant falsehood, and destroying all sound ethics.

When the reformer attacks our brutal social conditions, he is opposed at every step by the millions, including the best educated or rather learned who really believe themselves the special champions of morality and righteousness, as did the Jews when they assailed Jesus for healing the afflicted on their Sabbath, which they had only inherited from the Pagans.

And many who think themselves the champions of free-thought are champions at the same time of falsehoods established by the barbarians of five thousand years ago.

Nowhere is this barbarism of sentiment so intense as in the sphere of sexual relations, which have been debased into the realm of filth and disgust, so deeply that many centuries will be required to lift them into the sphere of love, light and wisdom.

I presume the readers of Lucifer must understand this, but I fear they have not especially sought for the taproot of the Upas tree they would destroy, and I write now to call their attention to it—to show where it lies, and how it must be dug up or burned out before human freedom and practical wisdom can flourish.

I suppose they will not be shocked when I say the taproot of all that afflicts humanity today is to be found in the Bible. There we find the debasement of woman, the filthy conceptions of all things in the sphere of love, and the pervading spirit of malignity which burns out as by fire all spirit of philanthropy—for it portrays a malignant demon as divine, and the entire Universe as the home of endless agony, except only this purgatorial world, which is kept in progress only as a small nursery to supply its infinite hell with human fuel.

There is no room in Lucifer to demonstrate these assertions. But assuming them to be true (and they are the result of sixty years of original investigation) the only thorough effectual way to relieve mankind from the martrydom of the ages is to remove the Bible and make room for rational philosophy, for religion, which is but ethics, and for the boundless freedom of thought which theology forbids.

Seeing this to be my duty if possible to be achieved, my readers think I have achieved it in publishing "Primitive Christianity" which demonstrates beyond contradiction that the Bible is an anonymous and fraudulent compilation, secretly manufactured in Rome to establish the Papacy, which culminated in the Holy Inquisition, and burying in oblivion the grand reformatory work of the Jewish martyr, who lost his life in trying to supersede Jewish superstition, whose thoroughly falsified history appears in the New Testament.

Lucifer is doing a good work in chopping at some of the foulest branches of the Upas tree, but until the tap root is destroyed and philosophy substituted for superstition, the world will continue to groan in its miseries, and all that Lucifer chops will continue to form again through the coming centuries, though a few freethinkers may maintain a struggling existence in narrow limits, enjoying freedom in their own souls, though doomed to breathe the universal social malaria, and suffer from the universal social conditions, which they must be realizing now, with but little hope of amendment for themselves, while they are trying to help posterity and resisting the gloomy domination of the Bible. No radical social reform is possible while that book is held in high honor. Under its jurisdiction, neither true liberty, true philosophy, nor true ethics can be possible.

I do not deny the necessity of Lucifer adhering to its one great theme, on which it is doing good work—for I have realized the failure of the opposite policy in giving my life to all human science and all social reform, working for posterity,—though I might have accomplished ten times as much in this century with a single theme.

Lucifer is opening a new line of thought for those who may outgrow the Bible authority but may cling to some of its debasing conceptions. A graduate from the Bible school needs a wise friend to lead him out of Biblical fog into clear sunshine.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXXIV.

Thus the autumn with its gorgeous colors had come and gone. Chilly days and raw wet nights were now in order, but the glowing fire in the grates only added to the cheerfulness of the room and the closely drawn curtains closed out all that was unpleasant and dismal. Then came the icy frosts and the first snow and with it a letter from Wilbur announcing the long promised visit of himself and Mrs. Leland. Edith and Hilda were almost wild with joy and anticipation. At last! at last! this so long, so sorely missed brother was coming home to his own, to clasp them in his arms, and they counted the days and hours until he should be in their midst. But theirs were not the only hearts that beat high at the contemplation of the coming event. Imelda was scarcely less excited than were the sisters. With a tender cadence the name "Wilbur" lingered upon her lips, but not for him alone did her heart beat with joy. Mrs. Leland received no small share—her bonny Margaret's mother. And yet another heart beat high in anticipation. Osmond, when told of his mother's expected visit, had turned white to the very lips. Faint and trembling he had sunk into a chair, and for the remainder of the evening had been strangely quiet and absent-minded.

"What is it? Not pleased, Osmond?" The boy looked up into Imelda's eyes and she saw that his own eyes were filled with tears.

"Do you know, do you realize what this meeting may mean to me? My heart is going out in advance to the woman who is my mother. I know I shall love her. I know that I shall find her all that my mind has pictured. I know that I shall find in her eyes a new life; in her eyes and arms, such as I have never known. But what else will it mean for me? Great as has been the fall of respect for the man who is my father, when I contrast his life and teachings with what I have here been taught, yet for all that he is my father! That fact remains. The forming of new and purer ties means the sundering of some old ones, and although I can only win thereby an untold amount of good, the fact still remains that it hurts."

Imelda's hand gently passed over the clusters of fair curls as she said,

"I can but honor you for an emotion that is the surest proof of a heart good and undefiled. I feel certain that if you will follow its dictates you will soon be able to judge whether it was affection for you which caused your father to pierce your mother's inmost soul by depriving her of the child she had nourished with her heart's blood. Can you think of more refined cruelty than to rob a mother of the babe that has lain for months beneath her heart, and that, with the most excruciating pain, and with great peril to her own life, has been born into the world? Do you think a father's affection can excel, or even equal, the love of a mother? Then think of the years of hungry yearning that have filled that gentle heart."

The boy had not answered, but throughout the evening had remained quiet, lost in thought. But after that, day by day a restlessness had come over him scarcely permitting him to remain any length of time in one place. More glaring became the father's coarseness as with a critical eye the boy followed his movements—his actions and his words. Often he found himself remonstrating with him. At first these remonstrances had elicited blank surprise, then he had been rudely laughed at and taunted that he must have fallen in love with some Sunday school Miss.

"That's all right," Mr. Leland had said. "Couldn't help being sweet on the little creatures myself. In fact am so occasionally yet, but not to the extent that it is going to interfere with any enjoyment in life. Don't be foolish, boy. Kiss the pretty soft lips and tell her pretty things to satisfy her; that need not prevent you from doing just as you please; and by no means, let me tell you, will it affect me. Girls are pretty playthings that help to while away the time, but the man is a fool who permits one of them to affect him more seriously. I have had a dose of it which I have no desire to have repeated."

Fearing a tirade against a certain woman who all unconsciously had grown into his heart he swallowed his disgust and left his father to himself. Judging his mother by those other women whose "sentiments" were the same as hers he came to wonder how it had come about that she could have linked her fate with that of his father. He reproached himself for entertaining such thoughts, but yet was unable to banish them. And so it came that often and still more often Osmond found his way to the Westcot home. Sometimes he would also wend his way to the home of the Wallaces, but as the sisters had no control there outside their own sanctum it was not quite so homelike and harmonious, not quite so natural and free. More often he would stop at their door only a few minutes to leave it a little later with both sisters under his care. Thus it was that time went by and the change, the most important event in young Leland's life, came nearer.

All day long the soft, fluffy masses had been falling, noiseless, incessant, covering hill and plain, and enveloping the world, as it were in one vast winding sheet. The merry sleigh bells were tinkling, but it was more work than pleasure to be out in the soft yielding masses of fresh fallen snow. The hearts of the young beat high in anticipation of coming pleasures, but older and wiser heads took it not so lightly. They looked more seriously at the mass of whirling fluffy flakes as they came piling down faster and ever faster until you could see scarce a half dozen feet before you, while anxiety crept into many a heart. And not without cause. Already every train was late, and there was much fear of trains being snow-bound. In the evening, when in spite of unpleasant weather our friends gathered at the Westcots' they wore very serious faces indeed. According to the dispatch they had received, informing them on what train the dear expected ones would leave Chicago, they would be due in Harrisburg the following morning at ten o'clock. If they had started at the time intended they would in all likelihood be detained many hours. If they were fortunate enough to lie over in some city there would be no harm done, but on the trackless prairies it would be far from pleasant at the best. There was no music and singing that night. Too much anxiety for merry-making, and at a much earlier hour than usual they again dispersed. Edith and Hilda's hearts were heavy as they kissed their girl friends good night. So long, O so long they had hoped and longed and waited for this brother to come, and now?— Surely, surely their fondest hopes would not be thus rudely shattered. With a mighty effort the tears were forced back and bravely they clung to cheering hope. Just as they were about to descend the stone steps leading from the front of the building, two strong arms wound themselves about Hilda's form and lifting her bodily carried her safely to the waiting cutter. Warmly and snugly she was tucked in by loving hands and just for one moment a pair of mustached lips touched hers, then the words were whispered in her ear: "Courage little girl! be brave and strong. Tomorrow evening someone else will be claiming kisses from these sweet lips. Our precious ones will surely come."

It was the first time Lawrence had put his love into words and action, and the trembling lips of the blushing maiden thanked him for the sweet cheering words.

Norman had performed the same office for Edith. To save her feet from damp and cold he also had carried her down to the waiting cutter and tucked her in beside Hilda. Then taking his seat beside Osmond, another hasty good night, and soon the tinkling of the bells were lost in the distance.

Osmond was quiet; he had been quiet all the evening. Scarce a word had dropped from his lips. It is very doubtful indeed if the girls felt more keenly than he the danger threatening the travelers. The tension on his nerves drove him almost mad. He dare not give expression to his fear. It meant so much, so much—this coming of his mother. If she should perish! With a sudden clicking sound he clenched his teeth while the horror of the thought caused him to close his eyes. Would he then be able to say, "It was all for the best"?

The dismal drive came to an end. The girls were safely seen inside their home. Osmond was next deposited at the door of his father's dwelling and shortly after Norman also was housed with the four walls of his room. When the morning broke the snow was still falling with a likelihood that there would be no change very soon. The trees were bending and breaking under their load and only with the greatest difficulty could either man or beast move about. Trains which had been due the day before could not be heard from, owing to the fact that in many places the telegraphic wires had been broken. Evening again came, but as yet no news from the expected train whereon our travelers were supposed to be.

About noon the fall of snow had ceased; a change of temperature had set in; gradually it had been growing colder until at midnight of the following night the cold had reached an intensity which was almost unbearable. This added greatly to the horror of the possible situation of the travelers, and our friends were in a fever of anxiety. With blanched faces they moved about in their respective homes scarcely able to endure the dreary hours of waiting. Again the night passed and another intensely cold day was ushered in, and not until noon did any news reach them. A message was wired from Pittsburg that the train had been snow-bound in Ohio. Rescue trains had been sent and in all probability if nothing further ocurred to cause another delay, the train would reach Harrisburg by Thursday evening where it had been due Monday morning.

Impatience must be curbed. Another night and day must pass ere they could hope to fold their loved ones to their bosoms. But tedious as the hours had moved, the day was at last nearing its close, only a few more hours and then?— Just as the clocks were striking the hour of nine the puffing monster came steaming into the city with its load of human freight.

"The rainbow is not less beautiful and wonderful to me than to Noah, or to the aborigines, because I understand something of optics and the refraction of light. The Good of Truth, whether we worship it as an entity or as a personality, or conceive of it as impersonal, is an ever-living and persistent principle man can never cease to revere and admire. And his growth in knowledge and progress in all things refining and elevating to his nature will be promoted, not retarded, by the true but unrevealed, and as yet "unloved religion, 'The Religion of Progress'."

The World.

Fashion, the world, society, to me
These ever are as some brave board outspread,
Where men and women feign to feast, unfed;
Smiling and gay, yet holding in each eye
The piteous glare of hunger's agony.
Ah! this alone is death, and these the dead;
And yet men call it "life" plying, instead,
The child-like soul that loves simplicity.

A padded pomp, chill state, a gaslight glare,
The bitter sweet and dust of discontent,
Soul-hunger and a secret nose dare broach—

These are thy wages, world, thy servants wear
Upon their brows the stamp of manhood spent—
Lost innocence, and haunting, vague reproach.

Plumb-Line Penographs.

BY E. C. WALKER.

Why do so many Freethinkers so soon grow indifferent to reform work? One reason is that their Freethought is almost purely academical; they have not thought of applying their ideas in every-day life. Clinging to the moralism of the religious system whose theology they reject, they are indistinguishable in the mass of practical devotees. They vegetate; they do not live. Passively, at least, they are against liberty, and so are not unpopular, for today orthodoxy is moral, not religious.

"Victoria receives the loyal devotion of her subjects." That is a newspaper heading, ancent the Jubilee. The subject is, as the term implies, in subjection, hence he is a mere automaton; he has no choice; he must be devoted, "loyal." As Victoria has less control over the lives of the English people than the president of the United States has over the lives of the people of this country, it follows, that if the English people are the "subjects" of Queen Victoria, the people of the United States are the "subjects" of President McKinley. The conclusion is not far amiss.

Honesty in love is at a discount. Men meet with austere faces and speak of "virtue" as the dearest possession of the soul, and then each goes out and lives a life condemned by his lips and the lips of his fellows. Women do the same. It is a game of "I'll fool you and you may fool me." It is all right to make love behind the back of the husband or wife, but if the husband or wife knew and consented he or she would be looked upon with contempt by the purloiner of sweets. Such is the fruit of centuries of religious misleading and moral misteaching. Frank free love, free love for women as well as for men, is the only hope of salvation from hypocrisy and rottenness.

Captain Chapman, the notorious police thug of New York, has again projected his malodorousness into the nostrils of decent people, by ordering the wholesale arrest of all women found out of doors after a certain hour. This, we are told by the press, has already resulted in the gathering into the police net of several respectable women whose occupations force them to be out late at night. It is perfectly safe to say that no crime of this kind which Chapman may see fit to commit will lower him in the estimation of the present city "reform" administration. No woman not of the aristocracy has any rights which New York's enthroned "moralists" are bound to respect. But some day that gang of "respectable" roughs will move out in a hurry. They are piling up sins against a day of judgment that may come very soon. If Tammany has half sense "reform" will soon be dead in New York for many a day. It is dying, let us hope, self-stricken by Roosevelt, Chapman & Co. But will change of political masters result in a permanent betterment? No; the foundation is of the rotten stone of Imposed Authority, and the master builder was Superstition, worshiped alike by Republican and Democrat, by Mugwump and spoilsman, by partisan and non-partisan, by Christian and Infidel and Nothingarian. But the light is slowly spreading.

A correspondent of Lucifer says, "Nature makes no mistakes." And he says this at the conclusion of an argument intended to show that another writer is mistaken! Inasmuch as man is a part of nature, it inevitably follows that if Mr. Kerr was in error, as Mr. Slocum asserts he was, then nature does make mistakes.

It can only rationally be said that nature makes no mistakes when it is taken for granted that nature has no intentions, no plans, no schemes. Such is the fact, but looked at from the view-point of man, of his needs, of his happiness, nature teems with mistakes. The same is true when nature's workings are considered in relation to the needs, to the happiness of the other forms of life. The trouble with Mr. Slocum is that he has transferred to his fetich, Nature, the imagined perfections given by the Theist to his fetich, God. They worship at the same shrine, differently named.

"There will always be sustenance sufficient on earth for all the children of earth." This is true only when it is interpreted to mean that while one class of earth's children is cunning or strong enough to live on the other classes it will survive, although even then multitudes of the individuals of that class will perish miserably because of lack of sustenance. Taken as it stands, Mr. Slocum's assertion is too preposterous for serious refutation. In the sea it is answered, where not one in ten thousand of the fishes born reach maturity. In the forest it is answered, where there is not room for the development of one in ten thousand of the young lives planted or prepared for planting. In man's kingdom, greatly superior intelligence mitigates somewhat the fierceness of the struggle, (as regards production and exchange) permitting the survival of a larger number in the same area from age to age, but the outcome will be the same—the area being limited, the capacities of reproduction unlimited—in the end the destructive checks will operate if the preventive checks have not been used. This is axiomatic.

Freethought "As She is Taught" in Oregon.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

"The Torch of Reason" says "The principal free love organ of Chicago" has misrepresented the Oregon Secular Union. In so far as my statement regarding its president is concerned, I cheerfully and gladly admit that I was mistaken. As I said in my letter to Mr. Geer, in which letter I gave the causes of my misapprehension, "'It is better to be right than to be president,' is an old saying. There have not been many occasions in my life when I would rather be wrong than either right or president, but in this instance I am glad to know I was wrong."

I am very sorry I cannot go on and say I was equally wrong in other statements made in that article. But, unfortunately, the Oregon Secular Union has taken a position utterly opposed to tolerance and honesty. "Many of our active members use tobacco and some, we are sorry to say, drink intoxicating liquors occasionally," Mr. Hosmer admits. "But," he naively adds, "some of these very workers were the most active in adopting the amendment to our by-laws which debars teachers and lecturers, (not members) from the use of these poisons"! Of course. Every one who has watched the prohibition movement knows that it is made up principally of two classes: On the one hand, the intolerant fanatics who think the world should be governed by the elect, of which they are the bright and shining lights, and on the other hand, of a large class of the weak and incapable, who feel that they are unable to control themselves and believe the rest of the world to be equally lacking in backbone. Knowing their own moral weakness, they hope by lip-service to attain the semblance of "respectability."

It would appear that the Oregon Secular Union is organized into a little church in fact as well as in name. The "teachers and lecturers" hand down their garnered wisdom to the "members" who are not to presume to teach anything which they have learned unless they pass the required "examination" and obtain a "license." If every other member should drink and smoke it could still be called a strictly temperate organization, according to these requirements. Vicarious virtue is a very convenient article to have in the Secular family.

Mr. Hosmer betrays the ignorance of isolation, if not the intolerance of Pharisaic youth, when he says "Free lovers will willingly associate with those who are opposed to their doctrine," but those who do not believe in free love will not remain in an organization where even the minority are free lovers. I am happy to be able to give a better testimonial to the tolerance of conservatives than would be possible if Mr. Hosmer's statement were true.

Mr. Geer says that when in Chicago he "associated with people of that belief [free love] just enough to satisfy myself they are mistaken." Very good. But on what evidence was Mr. Geer so easily satisfied? He called at our home a few times. On each occasion there were from three to twenty others present, and the conversation was of a general social nature. The first time he called was without invitation, so far as I know, though he was quite welcome, as is everyone. (I mention this fact merely to show that we were not wickedly endeavoring to associate with him and thus contaminate his morals, or thereby shine by the reflected light of the President of the great moral organization of the Pacific Coast.) Mr. Geer adds: "Mr. Harman and I have always been on the best of terms but in all our conversations the subject of free love was never mentioned." It will be seen that it is very easy to convince Mr. Geer of the erroneousness of a belief in liberty which he does not hold.

The Oregon Secular Union has the undisputed right to be taught only by those having the "moral" qualifications which it aspires to; we who are not, and do not desire to be, members, have the right as well to express our opinions of such qualifications. The "Torch of Reason" carefully avoids giving the name of the paper in which my criticism appeared. Does it fear that some of its readers may want to learn something of the tabooed "doctrine" of free love?

The "Torch of Reason" is published weekly at Silverton, Oregon. Those who believe in "unlimited liberty of thought" in its prescribed limitations, will find it just the paper they want.

Morality and Sex.

BY JAMES W. ADAMS.

A perfect system of morals cannot be inaugurated while enforced ignorance upon the relations of the sexes is the law of the land. We must have liberty to investigate along lines of individual thought—and when I say liberty, I mean that liberty which is born of enlightenment. Each has the right to determine for him or herself that which he may or may not do, and it is not only my duty but the duty of society to protect them in this right no matter how antagonistic to prevailing sentiment.

Let us candidly compare the systems advocated by Lucifer readers, and learn if we can which system is most worthy of adoption by earnest truth seekers. Marriage, as it is, with its legitimate fruit—brothels, saloons, penitentiaries, lunatic and imbecile asylums, poor-houses and hospitals, drug-shops, infanticides, foeticides, premature decay and other concomitants in the living hells called homes, is deplored by all. What marriage will be under freedom is purely speculative, and so, too, of Dianism and variety. All agree upon "natural selection" but disagree as to its interpretation or application. Marriage says, one man for one woman, and vice versa, and a continent life until church sanctification and state regulation open wide the floodgates of passion. Dianism says, a continent life except for procreation. Variety says, a free field and an open search for the highest and best.

If a continent life is the summum bonum of mundane blessings then nature made a mistake in endowing us with amative desires and sexual organs. The fact that nature fixes a limit to the child-bearing period and does not divest woman of amative desire, mammae, and sexual organs clearly shows that they are to be used. The fact that many women who during the child-bearing period were cold, listless, irresponsive to the husband's caresses, after the "change of life" suddenly develop amative desire in excess of that felt by the conjugal partner, is prima facie evidence that intelligent guidance, and not repression, is the royal road to earthly happiness.

It is an open question whether repression (continence) is productive of greater evils than unbridled passion. Sexual desire may be compared to a mountain stream easily checked at the outset, but since the fountain continually sends forth its waters the dam must be continually strengthened, and it is only a question of time when one of two things is inevitable: Either the fountain is submerged [forced to find another outlet] or the dam is swept away and the flood leaves desolation in its track. Variety would first dam the stream, then by intelligent guidance control the sex-life, so that unwelcome children, shattered nerves and bitter recriminations would no longer curse the race.

If one man for one woman and vice versa is the law of nature then association in any form with any other than the selected one, is a transgression of that law; hence hugs and kisses should be denied, hand shakes forbidden and kindly thoughts eradicated, for thought is a wonderfully operative factor in the realm of sex.

If one man for one woman be the only rule it is logical to add, "one and inseparable, now and forever without equivocation or mental reservation"—a kind of Aunt Jemima sticking plaster. But since monogamy, like "prohibitition," says, "touch not, taste not, handle not," how am I to determine which plaster is the "one among ten thousand and altogether lovely"? Surely not by sitting down and, Micawber-like, "waiting for something to turn up." Nature's analogies are safe guides—to other truths. Why then should we not apply the scientific method in this as in all other problems?

Science learns only through experiment, and by repeated verifications. It sifts and weighs the evidence. A jury, before accepting evidence, considers the credibility of the witness; that is, first, his character for truth and sound judgment, then his opportunities for knowing whereof he speaks. To illustrate: Suppose a jury is sitting in judgment upon persimmons as an edible fruit, and two opossums of mature age and equal in intelligence are witnesses. One testifies that in the hey-day of his youth he foolishly ate one persimmon—that it was bitter and so puckered up his mouth that he vowed to forever eschew persimmons, and that he had kept his vow. The other testifies that he has spent many an evening searching for the golden fruit, and that the very thought of persimmons makes his mouth water; and that when they are ripe, no matter how dark and stormy the night, his legs invariably carry him to the nearest persimmon tree. Each witness speaks from experience. And so also of men.

One man for one woman implies that there is but one man in the universe that can vibrate every chord in each woman's being. Let us suppose woman to be a multi-stringed instrument, and that one man vibrates but a single chord, another a score of chords, another a hundred, another a thousand and so on. It is needless to ask which of these evokes the sweetest response. This is unity in diversity. This is variety. This is the law of attraction and repulsion, whether we recognize the fact and take advantage of it to soften the asperities of life, or ignore it and become as Wandering Jews in a land wherein nature has provided a bounteous feast and invites all to freely partake and rest 'neath sylvan shades.

One man for one woman is at variance with facts of every day life, demonstrated everywhere by the law of growth. He who grows takes an advanced position and the companion must keep step or lose companionship. A man and woman may grow in the same direction and at the same rate. If this were the rule monogamy would have a firm foothold. As a rule we find wife and husband growing in different directions—as well as one faster than the other, and often there is a gulf between them so wide, that it is impossible to bridge it. Hypocritical smiles and perfunctory words and acts only make a bad matter worse.

I can conceive but one condition under which people can be as near and dear to each other day in and day out, for a series of years, and that is a condition of arrested development. Though seemingly still, at times, all nature points to change. Our affections, loves, hopes and fears ebb and flow with every change of environment. In the light of our hopes and fears, and with the knowledge we possess, it is safer to say that when man knows himself, when his every function and faculty is unfolded, when he realizes that life holds no higher object than that of contributing to the happiness of others, and that he who renders others happy is happy himself, then, and not till then can there be a complete union of man and woman.

This may be but an Utopian dream, but until it is practicalized man can be but a wayfarer upon life's tempestuous sea, driven hither and yon by adverse wind and tide, hoping some day to find surcease from the irony of fate in the sheltering arms of a loving woman whose presence, even, is a benediction to his way-worn soul.

The "Sexual Embrace" (Spell it with golden capitals!) is earth's choicest blessing; but beware! lest it become the most damnable curse that outraged nature can inflict upon her misguided children. If there be a heaven, within whose amaranthine bowers can be enjoyed sweeter and tenderer emotions, deeper and purer sensations, brighter anticipations and higher inspirations than are vouchsafed to man whilst nestling in the arms of a woman responsive to his holiest thoughts and highest ideals, then give me that heaven and close the portals for all time.

If there be a hell more lonely, more loathsome, more hateful and soul-blighting than that of being confined with, or tied to, an unfortunate victim of bad heredity, of miseducation and of misdirection, then may I be delivered from that hell.

"The Right to Work."

BY H. E. ALLEN.

In H. M. Parkhurst's last sociologic lesson the opinion is advanced that no person has the right to require the opportunity to work.

Let us analyze this view for a moment. Under barbarism all have practically equal opportunities to gain a livelihood. But society, under so-called civilization is responsible for the wide inequalities that we see today in these opportunities. Yes, society has actually encouraged these inequalities by regarding property rights superior to human rights and allowing private monopoly of the necessities of life.

Now, mind you, society has taken away from millions the opportunity to gain a living which they would no doubt possess had not society interfered. Yet, Mr. Parkhurst has the gall to affirm that these starving people have no right to require of society the opportunity to gain a living by work. They have no right to ask a penny from the robber that has taken their all!

I regret exceedingly to see Lucifer's space taken up by such economic rot as this. "A man living alone has manifestly the right to work," says Parkhurst. Bright idea! This is equivalent to saying that if a man was shipwrecked on a barren island and could find no article of food but oysters he would have a right to eat oysters. Who would deny him the right? And if he could not live off the labor of others his stomach would be pretty apt to admonish him that he must hustle or starve.

What is this thing society that forces starvation on some and wanton luxury on others? That fastens a saw-log to one and a balloon to another and bids both arise equally? Is it not one of the great, big shams of the day? Proudhon says society under civilization should have no other object than liberty, equality and security. We are not associated for the sake of property; property is anti-social and is not a natural right.

"It is eternally true that nothing is right," says Wayland, "that produces directly or indirectly, human misery or pain, and private capital does this, and has done so since the world began."

I am inclined to believe that the two Parkhursts—one in theology the other in economics—are both ancient numbers. In economics the world has been moving along on the limited express while I fear Lucifer's sociologic writer has been aboard the way freight.

He seems too anxious to defend the present order of things, and no doubt feels out of his element writing for such a constituency. His utterances remind me of a sentiment recently set forth in the Chicago "Tribune" which advised its readers to sprinkle strychnine on the "hand-outs" for tramps, while at the same time it is doing all in its power to defend and intensify a system that makes tramps. To say that a human being has not the right to demand work when society has taken away such opportunity is on a par with the "Tribune's" utterance.

Berwick, Ill., June 25, '97.

[Free expression of honest thought is Lucifer's cardinal principle, or rule of action. Hence while I do not agree with the writer of "Sociologic Lessons" in his views on economic questions I concede his right to a small part of Lucifer's space in which to tell our readers what he thinks upon these topics. That a correct solution of industrial and economic problems is very necessary to the right solution of the sex problem—the race-culture problems to which Lucifer is mainly devoted—needs little argument, and if Mr. Parkhurst believes that he can help to solve these perplexing questions I recognize that his helpful work in Lucifer's main contention entitles him to have his say in his own way. As often stated before, we can give comparatively little space to economics and finance, and hence the request is here repeated that no long articles on these questions be sent us—also that none but courteous language be used in discussion. Remember, please, the old Latin maxim, Suaviter in modo, etc. M. H.]

To Extend Lucifer's Work.

"New York, June 24, 1897.

"FRIEND HARMAN:—I observe with much pleasure the offer of Mr. —— —— in Lucifer of June 23, to start a fund of $500 for distributing sample copies, and I will second the motion with a pledge of fifty dollars toward the same object. The half of it I send herewith. The proposition is to send 1,000 extra copies weekly during six months to new names, which would mean 26,000 sample copies in all. From my experience in such matters I would by all means advise that they be pretty widely distributed. I would not send all to only 1,000 persons during six months, nor would I send to 26,000 persons—only one sample to each; but by distributing all so that each new name should get one sample per month for four months would be probably the best system. Thus too many would not be wasted on persons who could not be made interested in the paper, while those who might be induced to subscribe would not be so likely to forget it if reminded about four times in as many months.

"It is wise to stimulate their interest now and then rather than satisfy it steadily for several months. I hope many others will come forward to insure the success of this very practical and sensible method of sustaining the paper. Yours truly,

There is force in what Dr. Foote says. We will cheerfully devote the money sent by each contributor to the method which that contributor deems best. Our experience has proved to us that money paid for trial subscriptions has been of much greater service to the paper than that given in straight donation. Some of our very best workers have become interested in Lucifer through a trial subscription sent by a friend.

H. E. Allen, Berwick, Ill., writes:

"I wish I could do something to help secure the offer made in last Lucifer but I am not able just at this time. Last week I sent in forty-five subscribers to the 'Appeal to Reason,' Girard, Kan., and paid for all of them six months. The trouble with me is, as I am now situated, I do not know three persons in my entire circle of acquaintance that I consider possessed of sufficient sense and liberality to take and pay for a copy of Lucifer. I am sorry to say it but such is the case."

When a friend is able and willing to pay for subscriptions to Lucifer the fact that he is not personally acquainted with many who would appreciate it need not deter him from such contribution. Others who have not the money can send in names and thus balance matters. Or, the money may be used as Dr. Foote suggests.

Theosophy.

The eleventh annual convention of the "American Section of Theosophists" closed its sessions in this city Sunday June 27, at Steinway Hall. Delegates were here from many parts of the United States and some from Europe and from India, the most distinguished among whom was Mrs. Annie Besant, the most famous living apostle, or expounder of the cult known as Theosophy—"Wisdom Religion." With her, as traveling companions, came the "Countess Wachtmeister" and son, of Sweden.

Since the close of the convention Mrs. Besant has delivered several public lectures to large audiences, the most noteworthy of which was that at Central Music Hall Monday evening, June 28 upon "Man's Invisible Bodies." The lecture was illustrated by stereopticon views showing what the speaker claims as the revelations of science in regard to the composition and appearance of the "astral and mental bodies" possessed by all human beings. Wednesday evening at "All Souls Church" Mrs. Besant discoursed upon "Man the Master of his Destiny," and on Friday evening, July 2nd, she is billed to speak at Steinway Hall upon "Brotherhood, the Necessary Basis of Society."

Our space for this issue being already full, we shall be obliged to postpone the further report of the lectures, and of the impressions made upon Lucifer's scribe by the former business partner of Charles Bradlaugh, now known as the "High Priestess of Theosophy."

"The Blight of Respectability."

Remarkable, and in some respects as startling as "Conventional Lies," which gave Dr. Max Nordau his first notoriety outside of his own country, is the publication just issued from the University Press, London, entitled "The Blight of Respectability; an anatomy of the disease and a theory of curative treatment." The author, Geoffrey Mortimer, is a direct and forcible writer and he flays conventional society mercilessly. Hear what he says of respectability:

"Respectability stands for gentility, and the genteel folk are not often of the orders aristocratic and proletarian, but of the bourgeoisie. To call a decent, intelligent man respectable is to dub him genteel, and to label him so implies that he has reached about the lowest level of mental degradation. Would it not be an act of sheer defamation of character to describe Ben Jonson, Shakspere, Dryden, Fielding and Burns as "respectable men"? No great man has ever been, or ever can be, of the respectabilities, for the simple reason that the great are not ordinary, and the ordinary alone are respectable."

Here are some more sentences picked at random from the book:

"Nobility of character and a reputation for respectability, the two things are utterly incompatible.

"You cannot be at once highly respectable and progressive.

"Respectability is one of those dull and sordid sins without charm.

"All good, regular conduct was once bad and irregular. But originality and irregularity are abhorred of the respectable class.

"There is perhaps no better instance of the moral blight that respectability has upon the middle-class mind than the treatment of Mr. Bradlaugh, not only at the hands of rabid sectarians, but by timorous and respectable rationalists and utter indifferentists.

"To live respectably, as the world deems respectability, is to live a lie. No man or woman with a part to play in life can play it well if they are constantly exercised as to what people will think—people, in this instance, standing for Respectability.

"We have clothed the innocent nude, and taught them shame, and in making them respectable we have annihilated their pristine morality, and substituted western cant and indecency.

"The black shadow of the plague of Respectability is over love and the relation of the sexes, and women suffer more than men from this terrible blight. Respectability isolates the sexes before marriage, and only allows them to discover each other's idiosyncracies, caprices, and foibles when they are inseparably united ankle to ankle and wrist to wrist, to hobble on through life, and pretend that they are enjoying the penance. I do not say that the shackles always gall. It is almost a sheer question of chance if they do not.

"For this fearful uncertainty Respectability is much to blame. Girls are immured and guarded, like vestal virgins of old; there is no wholesome widespread social commingling of the sexes. Boys are free; but what is their liberty worth to them, when girls are watched, chaperoned, and secluded at the very age when their society is most sought by the youth of the opposite sex? This nunnery system is practically restricted to the middle-class Respectables. What is its effect upon the morals and the weal of the order? Most disastrous. The young man, in a very large number of instances, gains his knowledge of womankind among the flashy, flighty, and even more undesirable specimens of the sex. He meets the Little Muddleton Road girls at parties occasionally, but if he walks home from chapel with one of them, Paterfamilias or Mamma intervenes, and cuts short the friendship, or they want to know the young fellow's 'intentions' toward Ethel. His own parents tell him he is too youthful, or too poor, to think of wooing yet; and I have even known mothers who excluded all girls from the house for fear that their sons should fall in love prematurely."

"L'Humanite Nouvelle."

Almost simultaneously with the announcement of the suspension of the publication of "Our New Humanity," comes the first number of "L' Humanite Nouvelle," a monthly periodical published in the French language at Paris, France. The similarity of the names would suggest the idea that "Our New Humanity" has been reincarnated and has commenced a new existence in another (hemi)sphere and in another language. "L' Humanite Nouvelle" calls itself "an international review of science and art." The May number, (which was kindly sent to Lucifer from London by George Bedborough, secretary of the Legitimation League) contains a number of articles by excellent writers on sociologic questions. The first article is "A Study of the Evolution of Primitive Religions," by Elie Reclus. This is followed by a translation from the English of "The Moral Evolution of Sex," by Patrick Geddes and Arthur Thompson. Other interesting articles are extracts from Jean Greve's forthcoming book "L' Etre Social" and Camille Lemonnier's "L' Homme en Amour." The price of the magazine is 15 francs ($3) a year. The office of publication is 5 impasse de Bearn, Paris, France.

Ask your newsdealer to order a few copies of "What the Young Need to Know." It is a good seller.

One or Many Loves.

BY E. B. FOOTE, JR., M. D.

[Concluded from last week.]

The anonymous author of a very radical book on "The Truth About Love" says, "We must of course preserve monogamy as the highest type of sexual relation; (under its sanctions certainly the most worthy nations have flourished) but in addition we must make allowances for human weakness and human necessity. . . . . The highest type of womanhood is the one who surrenders herself to continue the race—the one who relinquishes all other delightful occupations of woman in order that humanity may be continued and perfected on earth. She is the most glorious type of woman. In future ages the mother will be idolized; she will be set up as the goddess of this planet," and so on for two or three pages he praises the high estate of the woman willing and fit for maternity, but he equally recognizes that this cannot be the lot of all, and his love philosophy is broad enough to provide for all normal instincts and pleasures—"based upon human nature as it is." This liberal policy would permit everyone to make the most of life in his or her environment. Those fit, able and circumstanced for monogamic family life should be encouraged to enter upon it, and he would even prohibit divorce and discountenance adultery, for the sake of pure breeding. Yet he says "altogether we should work for a healthier state of public opinion which would admit to every human being the satisfaction which their senses, affections and emotions require," . . . . and "every form of the sexual relation actually existing should be honestly recognized by society as an indispensable part of the social machine—made to subserve social uses."

Since that book was written divorce has come more and more to be recognized as one of the necessary adjuncts of monogamic family life in the most progressive nations, and for the encouragement of establishing homes it has proven advisable to permit their breaking up by the unfortunates who have made serious mistakes, in order that those of homing instincts may try again to adopt the mode of life best suited to their inclinations and the propagation of the race. We need more rather than less of divorce. Of course the more permanence in monogamic life the better so long as its best features can be maintained, but to protect it against its worst aspects and the rearing of children of hate and accident in unhappy, demoralizing travesties of homes, it is certainly necessary to provide for undoing errors and readjusting human relationships in accord with varying attractions.

Recognizing marriage and divorce, and thus making due provision for propagation by those so disposed, custom may as well sanction and law ignore the transient attractions and relations of those inclined to variety and promiscuity. The last writer quoted and most other unbiased students of history find that all sorts of sexual relations have existed in all ages, and even those most tabooed have survived the persistent and renewed assaults of moralists. Religion and moral sentiment of today "ignore one of the most potent facts in human life. Sexuality is put aside as degraded, filthy, unclean, and the result is that it becomes so. . . . . It is the means of spreading disease and confusion all through the social life of Christendom. . . . It poisons the life of the chaste mother and the unborn child." (From "The Truth About Love.")

The highest aim of the efforts for uplifting humanity by establishing a one-idea system of sexual relations based on a mistaken and unphysiological view of dominant natural forces, has thus defeated itself. Children are too often the product of accident in hellish homes, born of mismated parents held together by law, and blighted before birth by contagious, poisonous diseases that can never be eradicated so long as irregular, clandestine and demoralizing promiscuity is the only recourse for irrepressible animal propensities. Man remains mainly animal, in spite of attempts to make him mainly angel, and the only effectual solution of the sexual problem must be either by rational recognition and regulation of the needs of man as an animal, or his conversion to the angelic state in this domain by operation for the abolition of manly elements.

It must be either sanctify or crucify. Man has tried both ways during thousands of years, and yet he is not happy, but he has now a scientific knowledge on which to base a new effort toward rational instead of superstitious sanctification, and so there is one more chance for him. In a recent book entitled "The God Idea of the Ancients," by Eliza Burt Gamble, is a very interesting chapter on "Pire and Phallic Worship" in which she shows that during four thousand years gross phallicism substituted a high and pure form of worship of the creative principle, that man lapsed into superstition, sensuality and degradation through gradually increasing dominance of the male element, religion became degraded and human nature corrupted by the subjection of female instincts and the deification of brute passion.

Christianity involved an ascetic reaction crying out against all sensual gratification "Crucify it," but it has had two thousand years in which to make this salvation-by-asexualization war-cry, and not even a majority of its own converts are reformed according to this ideal.

It appears to be the lesson of history that man has vacillated like a pendulum, tacked this way and that, and gained some wisdom by sad experience in the errors of one-sided courses. Having mangled and mutilated himself by asceticism, and on the other tack exhausted himself by excesses; having once worshiped the female principle and perhaps suffered too much from domination of feminine ideals, and again set up the masculine element as supreme power and let male propensities run riot in celebrating its ascendancy, it would seem as though it were time to effect a compromise between the contending forces of Yoni and Lingham, between creative love and animal lust, between asceticism and sensualism, and discover a possible safe, serene and peaceful course of life.

Mrs. Gamble believes that an ancient people reached a high state of civilization under pure nature-worship when the female attributes were regarded as the highest expression of the divine in the human, that woman was then regarded as the head and crown of creation, the first emanation from Deity—the representation of Perceptive Wisdom. The fall of man came about through the substitution of male gods, and promoting the idea that woman was made for man's use and pleasure. If this be true it shows the unwisdom of partiality, the mistake of adopting one-sided ideals, the impossibility of transforming the human to divine, of making gods of men, or on the other hand of permanently degrading woman to the position of a subservient tool of man. Let men and women learn from science instead of superstition to understand their positions in life, to appreciate each others' needs, abilities and hopes, and if they do not always reach the beatific state of mutual worship, there will at least be less of self-worship and less unprincipled contention between the male and female principles.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXXV.

Heaving bosoms, concealing madly beating hearts, were hidden under the heavy fur-lined wrappings. In the excitement and bustle of the jostling throng our waiting friends greatly feared missing the travelers in the murky light, but just as the train was again pulling out, Imelda espied a lady and two gentlemen who seemed hopelessly seeking someone, judging from their hurried glances. Quickly walking up, that she might the better look at their closely muffled figures, she was recognized by the lady traveler, and,

"Imelda!" broke from her lips as she stepped forward and folded the girlish form in her arms, kissing her again and again.

"Dearest Mamma Leland!"—and the kisses were returned with interest. When released it was to be again enfolded in a pair of stronger arms—this time a perfect bear's hug. Then followed hasty introductions. Several more embraces, wordless, but nevertheless speaking volumes, and then Norman spoke:

"Save the caresses for an hour later; they will keep, I am sure. This weather is not at all inviting, so pile into the waiting sleighs, that we may go where a welcome is prepared for you."

"One moment,"— It was Wilbur's strong pleasant voice. "I make bold to bring you a fellow traveler who has been of great value to us. Mr. Paul Arthurs, I think deserves a better fate than to be left to the tender mercies of a cheerless hotel on a night like this." These words were followed by a hearty invitation and welcome. At first Mr. Arthurs protested against intruding so summarily on perfect strangers, but was shortly overruled, and a few minutes later the sleighs were flying over the smooth surface of the already beaten track, and in a very short time the piercing night air was exchanged for that of the warm rooms at the Westcot mansion. Willing, friendly hands were assisting each of the travelers to warmth and comfort. Mrs. Leland was supplied a soft warm robe, a loose wrapper from Imelda's wardrobe. As there was no possibility of procuring their trunks before morning, dry hose and furlined slippers were provided for the weary nether limbs. After a refreshing bath Imelda's deft fingers neatly and tastefully arranged the tired woman's hair. Then telling her that she looked ever so much better than a half hour previous, she escorted her to the parlor to find that the men had just preceded them. Both the gentlemen guests had been supplied from Mr. Westcot's wardrobe, and they looked fresh and bright enough to give the impression that they were there for an ordinary social call. Wilbur's eyes lit up with a bright gleam as Imelda entered. Without a moment's hesitation he held out both hands and drawing her close, held her face where the full light of the chandelier overhead fell upon it—for a minute drinking in the full glow of her beauty, watching the rich color come and go in the fair cheeks. Then taking the sweet proud face in both his hands he kissed the ripe ruddy lips, once, twice and thrice.

"Now," he said, "I want a look at someone in the——daylight I almost said; 'tis the gaslight, I mean, which is almost as bright."

Norman was standing near, leaning with his elbow on the piano, watching the scene before him with a warm light in his eyes. Understanding well who Wilbur's "someone" was, he stepped forward and extended his hand with a pleasant, happy smile lighting up the handsome manly countenance. For a few moments the black and blue eyes met, each reading in the depths of the other's soul; each satisfied with what he saw and read there. It was a moment, "When kindred spirits met," when "soul touched soul." As they stood there, man to man, hand clasped in hand, each knew and felt that he had found a friend worthy of the name, and when a woman's soft hand was laid on theirs, as if in blessing, it was Norman's lips that touched the woman's hand, but Wilbur's dark face was laid close to hers, and as their lips met the whispered words fell upon her ear:

"Imelda, gem of women, in this precious brother you have found a jewel worthy of the finest setting. You have been a sweet and successful teacher."

With the pure love-light in two pairs of eyes reflected in her heart she turned to leave them together. Little gushing Alice was just getting through making Mrs. Leland welcome when the eyes of the latter fell upon a sweet face, lit up by a pair of dreamy hazel eyes. Something in the face struck her as familiar, but she was unable to place it. The girl saw and understood and was in the act of moving forward when Imelda caught the look on Mrs. Leland's face. In a moment more she stood at Cora's side, laying her face to hers she said:

"Do you understand?"

"I do," Mrs. Leland replied. "It is your sister." Here again after a few moment's conversation Imelda had the satisfaction of knowing that two hearts, both dear to her, would meet and love.

In glancing about she espied Edith deep in conversation with the stranger, the traveling companion of Mrs. Leland and Wilbur. He was holding her hand in a close clasp and looking into the dark eyes in a way wholly surprising in a stranger on such short acquaintance. The color was coming and going in the sweet face and her eyes had in them most plainly an answering warmth. He certainly was a very handsome man; one that any woman would be apt to turn and look at again when meeting him in a ballroom or on the street. Fair, with a light curling silky beard and a free open countenance; tall and well proportioned he was a picture of manly beauty. Edith looking up and, seeing her friend's perplexed and wondering gaze, smiled and beckoned,

"You are surprised, I see, at our seeming unwarranted familiarity, but do you remember the day when Cora made her first appearance downstairs after the accident, and we were weaving such golden plans for our future? Well you also remember that Hilda spoke of a gentleman we had met in one of our summer vacations in the mountains? I see you do remember. I had thought the friendship of Mr. Arthurs was to be only a pleasant memory when lo and behold I recognize him in this traveling companion of our loved ones, and to make the surprise more complete, Harrisburg was his destination, as he was coming here on matters of business and intended remaining in the city for some time."

Imelda expressed her delight in finding in him a friend of her friends, and was about to move on when Mr. Arthurs asked for Hilda. That maiden was discovered serenely smiling and rosily blushing while listening to some, from all appearance, highly interesting tale of Lawrence Westcot's. Edith forthwith drew her new found friend in the direction of the two.

With a happy smile upon her face, reflecting the sunshine of her heart in her eyes, Imelda was flying from group to group when they suddenly rested upon the sad face of a boy whose form was half hidden in the heavy curtain of a deep bay window to which he had withdrawn himself. In a moment she saw it all. The boy had requested not to be introduced to his mother at the depot. He would wait a more favorable opportunity.

"It would only excite her," he said, "and be very unsatisfactory."

His request had been granted, but in the excitement that followed he had momentarily been forgotten. Not dreaming that her son might be among this group of bright intelligent people Mrs. Leland was giving her every thought to winsome Cora whose heart was being drawn out to meet hers in glad response.

Imelda crossed the room to where Osmond stood, his eyes filled with tears as she approached,

"Why so sad, my boy? Cheer up! Do you think you are now ready to look into your mother's eyes?"

"My mother! how strange the words sound; but I am afraid!"

'Afraid! Afraid of what?"

"Of the disappointment that may possibly fill them when they rest on me. It would hurt if there should be but a momentary reflection therein."

Imelda's gentle hand lifted the chin of the boy that was drooping in a dejected manner,

"Those words that speak of the fear of a disappointment show that you have not known a mother's heart. Come now and have this fear cast out,"—and taking the trembling boy by the hand she drew him from his hiding place and approached with him the woman to whom he owed his being. Laying one arm about his neck Imelda drew his face to hers, with her other hand she touched Mrs. Leland's arm to draw her attention.

"See! Mamma Leland. Who is this I bring you?"

It was a moment of intense expectation. Mrs. Leland quickly turned, and for a moment stared—then gave a quick gasp. That face! Just for a moment she had thought it was Margaret, so great was the resemblance, but only a moment. His look was strange and yet not strange. From his face she glanced to that of Imelda, and back again to the boy. She rose from her chair pressing both hands to her madly beating heart. Her face became deathly white. Slowly the boy's hands were extended towards her—an agonized pleading look lay in the large blue eyes.

"Mother!" broke from the pallid lips.

"Osmond!" echoed the mother, and then she folded her long lost child, her darling boy! in close embrace near to her wildly beating heart.

To be continued.

VARIOUS VOICES.

C. Carter, Lockport, N. Y.:—Please say if "Hilda's Home" will be published in book form. If not, have you the back numbers up to date? If yes, state price.

[Again we say,

First. While we are getting much encouragement to put the story in book form—many readers saying they will take one or more copies—the promises are not yet sufficient to justify the venture.

Second. While the supply lasts we will send back numbers containing the story at one cent each or 50 cents to present time,—as the story has been running about a year.]

B. F. Odell, Flagler, Colo.:—I am much pleased with "Motherhood in Freedom." It is grand. As soon as I can get the money I shall send for a dozen copies for distribution. I believe that above all things we should impress upon mankind the fact that the highest duty of woman is to give her child the very best physical, mental and moral endowment that is possible. That no man, or law, or custom, should be permitted to interfere with her doing this. The future progress of the race depends in a great degree on her securing and acting on this privilege. It is a privilege as well as a duty, for no woman whether free or not, would wish that her child should be anything but the best developed possible. It is only compulsion that forces women to accept sick, weak, deformed men as fathers for their children.

C. Flinders Procter, Oneroa, Mangaia, Cook Group, South Pacific:—The editor of "Natural Food" kindly sent me a few copies of Lucifer. I was pleased with them and admire the fearless tone. I am exceedingly anxious the see the June number—1896—of "Our New Humanity," but know no possible means of sending money from this out of the way island. I have been in the habit of paying for "Natural Food" by postage stamps. Cook Group stamps are very rare and worth more than their face value in England. I would be exceedingly obliged if you could receive stamps in payment.

[To all situated as friend Procter reports himself to be, we suggest that orders for Lucifer, "Our New Humanity" and other literature be sent directly to us, but that the pay for the same, if in colonial postage stamps, be sent to our European agent, Arthur Wastall, Cranbrook House, High Road, Chiswick, London. He can use postage stamps that would be o no use to us, here in Chicago. M. H.]

Adeline Champney, Sea Breeze, Fla.:—May I suggest tha Mattie Hursen's article in 662 answers itself? In the second letter quoted, may be found a solution of the question of the first. The lady writes—"I could not hold him to me." No! No free man or woman can be "held to" another. The lady was trying to find her happiness not in love, but in possession, and happiness is not there. The way to "hold your lover to you" is to set him free! Make no bonds, no ties, no vows, no promises. Be free to follow the true attraction and love will hold the lovers to each other; not in an exclusive sense, however. Who is so conceited as to think he or she has all the qualities which can be deemed charming or desirable to a lover?

Fie! Who are you that you should claim ownership of another? Or so servile that you would be owned by another? There is no happiness in possession, but in free interchange.

The writer of the letter has my sympathy, for she will suffer until she finds the freedom that will neither bind nor be bound, but will give and take in the purity of freedom. Turn your back for a moment, my sister, on your old ideal of exclusive possession, and look at Love fairly and without prejudice. A new glory will dawn for you as you look, and the happiness in love that comes not to the slave or the slave's master, will make your life new and beautiful as you rise to the ideal of the Free Woman!

I am a new subscriber but am with you in the march toward freedom, and you will hear from me again.

Peace.

BY WILLIAM FRANCIS BARNARD.

'Tis eve: the distant golden clouds are still;
The breeze is hushed, the birds have gone to rest
The sun's last light is on the highest hill;
From out the hollow sounds the cricket's trill;
Now calm comes to the breast,
The weary breast.
Strong souls, who labor on through every day
The love of liberty alive to keep,
The common rule of life yourselves obey;
You too are worn; come: put your tasks away
And take the boon of sleep;
Ah, sweetest sleep.

Contagious Diseases and Governmental Remedies.

BY ORFORD NORTHCOTE.

The publication of the Indian Army Medical Report, and the consequent revival of the agitation for the reinforcement of the Contagious Diseases Acts, have brought into the field of discussion the general question of the prevention of venereal disease by the compulsory inspection of prostitutes. When Mrs. Josephine Butler and her friends raised the outcry which resulted in the suppression of compulsory inspection they performed a substantial service in the cause of liberty; greater probably than they were aware; certainly greater than they intended. For while recognizing the value of their work, I by no means admire all of the motives which inspired it. Notwithstanding that the leaders of the agitation against the Acts placed the liberty of the individual in the foreground of their plea, it is very doubtful whether the desire for liberty were not subservient to some other desires not quite so laudable. There is little doubt that the underlying motive of the agitation was a puritanical one, and that its supporters were quite ready to infringe the liberty of the individual when it suited their puritanism to do so. What so alarmed British religious opinion was the possibility that men might be able to indulge promiscuous desires with safety; and it was by no means minded to facilitate departures from monogamic morality.

At the Congress of Geneva (September 1877) a great number of resolutions were passed affirming, among other things, the principle of the liberty of the subject; but the following clauses show clearly enough the teeth of the puritanical dog snarling behind the mask of the liberator. The Section of Morals affirms:

That the practice of impurity is as reprehensible for men as for women.

That the Regulations tend to destroy the idea of the oneness of the moral law for both sexes, and to lower the tone of public opinion upon this point.

That all systems or organizations of prostitution incite to debauchery, increase the number of illegitimate births, develop clandestine prostitution, and lower the level of public and private morality.

That by authorizing places for debauchery, and by making such disorder merely the exercise of a regular profession, the State sanctions the immoral idea that debauchery is a necessity for men.

That an appeal shall be addressed to the conscience of all authors, editors, librarians, and colporteurs of the two continents, to engage them in no way to favor the sale or diffusion of corrupting literature.

The Section of Law affirms:

It results from all this that the State must give up the idea of following its hygienic purpose, and so much the more as here the question is not of an exterior danger to public health in general, such as is an epidemic, but of a danger which is knowingly and voluntarily undergone.

It (the State) ought to interdict all collective organization of prostitution that is to say, to punish the offense of keeping an immoral house open to the public, and letting apartments for such uses. We preserve unchanged the penal provisions concerning outrages to public morals, and in especial public provocation to debauchery.

These clauses indubitably show that the cry of liberty was but a pretence. To affirm in one breath "That self-government in sexual relations is one of the indispensable bases of the health of individuals and of peoples," and in almost the next that immoral houses must be repressed and the penal provisions concerning outrages to public morals must be preserved unchanged, lets more than a rush-light into the nature of the motives animating the members of the Congress.

Had the Contagious Diseases Acts proposed to segregate all venereally diseased men in hospital prisons, thus making venereal disease in men a punishable crime, instead of proposing to protect frequenters of brothels, we should probably never have heard of Mrs. Butler as a champion of liberty. It may not have occurred to the abolitionists that the argument against compulsory inspection of prostitutes is equally applicable to any other compulsory inspection whatever. When an inspector of food enters a butcher's shop and seizes the stock of putrid meat exposed for sale, he is infringing the liberty of the butcher. But this infringement of liberty is passed by in silence, for hunger is a moral desire, and the purchaser of food is to be protected from disease. But illicit sexual desire is immoral and the purchaser of illicit sexual embraces is therefore not to be protected from disease. The abolitionist will answer that the two cases are not parallel because in the butcher's case it is only his wares that are inspected, whereas with the prostitute it is her body that has to undergo examination. Granting the difference, it is to be pointed out that there is no real distinction, for what is inspected in both cases is an article offered for sale.

And it is this selling of sexual charms that puts the prostitute and the butcher on the same plane. No one proposes to inspect the food offered by a host to his guest, nor on the other hand to inspect the body of a woman who voluntarily offers her embraces to her lover. To be consistent therefore, the abolitionist should agitate for the abrogation of all laws giving government officials the power to inspect the belongings of citizens. Sanitary inspectors infringe the liberty of householders, factory inspectors interfere with the liberty of entrepreneurs, and doctors, in complying with government regulations, lend themselves to infractions of liberty in reporting the infectious diseases—small-pox, scarlet fever, and the like, of their patients. No one, however, but the thorough-going individualist or anarchist objects to such infractions of liberty as these, and Mrs. Butler's greatest enemy would never accuse her of being an Anarchist.

But while the campaign of the Puritans against the Acts may be dismissed as unworthy of enlightened attention, and while, also, to the average man, considerations of the liberties of prostitutes are not likely to strongly appeal, it is of the utmost importance to discuss whether the proposed preventive measures are in reality efficacious, or whether they stand in the way of the adoption of other and better methods of dealing with this grave social danger.

For the purpose of this inquiry it must be clearly understood that contagious venereal diseases are divided into two broad classes, the syphilitic and the non-syphilitic. Dealing first with non-syphilitic disease as being of minor importance, carrying no hereditary taint, and of a local character, leaving behind no insidious germs from which secondary or tertiary outbreaks may arise, let us see how far the dangers of contracting it may be minimised by compulsory medical inspection. A medical examination may do two things. It may discover disease already known to the prostitute but which she is concealing; and it may discover disease in its early stages before she is aware of its existence. As to the usefulness of the first, let us inquire what are the motives which induce a prostitute to conceal the existence of a disease. And we shall the better discover these motives if we endeavor to understand the course of action which a diseased prostitute would be likely to pursue under conditions more favorable to her class. We will suppose that venereal disease carried with it no stigma as it does at present, and that Society were prepared to deal with it in the same humane spirit as it deals with other diseases. We will also suppose that Society, recognizing the gravity of the situation, were wise enough to establish an adequate number of hospitals where such diseases could be scientifically treated and where the patients, temporarily incapacitated from following their employment of prostitution, could be humanely supported and kindly dealt with. Under such conditions, not only would there be little if any motive for concealment, but there would be every inducement for a prostitute to place herself at once and unreservedly in the hands of the hospital authorities; especially if patients knew beforehand that they would not be compulsorily detained but could leave at will. More than this it would obviously be detrimental to the material prospects of a prostitute to continue to follow her calling when diseased. Not only would the immediate segregation of a hospital and the prompt and skillful medical treatment there afforded hasten a cure, but to continue to receive calls from her clients while diseased would damage her in their eyes once they discovered it. A prostitute's fortune, moreover, being largely dependent upon her beauty, she would, knowing the disfiguring effects of disease, avail herself of every opportunity of staying its ravages which an enlightened society afforded. Her eagerness to take advantage of such opportunities would be spurred by the fact that frequent sexual congress while venereally diseased is exceedingly painful and disagreeable.

Now why does a prostitute at present have resource to concealment of disease? In the first place the diseases peculiar to her calling are considered shameful, and this view operates in the same way as the false modesty of women generally operates in leading them to conceal menstrual disorders and other genital afflictions. In the second place, dealing now with state regulated prostitution, the diseased prostitute has a very vivid fear of being sent to the hospital. Nor is this fear unwarranted. Mons. Yves Guyot in his powerful work "La Prostitution," has torn aside the veil which hid the horrors of the Paris prison-hospitals from the public gaze. In these abodes of misery, the unfortunate victims of monogamic hypocrisy are treated with devilish cruelty. With his trenchant pen Mons. Guyot has described their sufferings and ill-treatment in terms which would make us shudder with horror were we not so eaten up with the puritanical morality of a so-called religion of love. Little wonder that the prostitute conceals her disease, and that she resorts to artifices calculated even to deceive the examining physician as to her condition. The safeguard then, that compulsory medical inspection gives against women concealing their diseases, is at best of questionable value, and would not be needed at all under the enlightened treatment of disease hinted at above, where concealment of disease would be the rare exception. It is hardly necessary to insist that a system of compulsory examination, with its concomitant of hospital prisons, only stands in the way of the adoption by society of such enlightened views, under which prostitutes would voluntarily co-operate with society in staying the ravages of diseases which are their most dreaded enemies.

"Hunting and Fishing."

BY CYRUS W. COOLRIDGE.

I fully agree with the sentiments expressed in Nellie M. Jerauld's article in a late Lucifer, entitled "What Shall We Teach Our Children." She is right in telling us that we must teach our children the truth and that we should not have a double standard of morals for men and women. I wish, however, to take an exception to one of her statements. She says:

"Teach the boy that it is the right thing to have his sister go hunting, fishing and boating with him, and that what will make him healthy and strong, erect and manly, will make his sister healthy, strong and womanly."

I agree with Mrs. Jerauld that what is good for a man cannot be bad for a woman, but I contend that hunting will never make a man manly or a woman womanly. I have very little admiration for a man who kills and maims birds and animals for the sake of sport. There is very little heroism in shooting robbins or rabbits, and how a civilized and humane man can find pleasure in such sport is beyond my understandidg. If we must kill animals in order to sustain our bodies—(I say if, for experience has taught me that we can be healthy and strong without eating meat), let us kill them, provided we do it with as little pain to our victims as possible, but why should we destroy life for amusement? Two wrongs cannot make one right, and because boys are savage enough to amuse themselves by killing birds and animals, it does not follow that such an occupation will make a girl healthy, strong and womanly.

I am greatly pleased with Mr. Walker's "Primer of Sexual Rationalism" in the April number of "Our New Humanity." I am not ready to accept all his statements. I am not at all sure that variety in sex relations is a desirable thing, but we must grant to others all the rights that we claim for ourselves and in our relations to the opposite sex we must be free from the dictates of those who do not accept our standard of morals. The truth is that no man or woman can decide for the whole world. Personally I am not a varietist, in fact, I am no "ist" of any kind, for I have never associated sexually with a woman, but I know very well that not all men are alike, and that what is good for me is not necessarily good for all men and women.

"Freethought" In Extremis.

BY WILLIAM GILMOUR.

That the National Secular Society of Great Britain has done good work for rationalistic thought in the past goes without saying; that it will continue the work I do not seriously doubt, but if the feelings which guide the Committee of the Glasgow Branch obtain in the other branches, and particularly with regard to the selling of books considered by some Secularists to be IMMORAL, I can only look forward to its speedy disintegration and death. The State—whether in America or Great Britain, is always ready to supply any quantity of moral censors without Freethinkers volunteering to do that nasty work. From the correspondence which I herewith append, the reader will observe that the Glasgow committee are qualifying themselves for the Comstock posts—and in the name of Secularism too!

At this point a little further explanation is necessary by way of appropriate introduction. A Mr. D. G. Lindsay, bookseller—who runs the literature stall in the Secularist meeting place in Brunswick street on the suffrage and at the pleasure of the above committee, had displayed in his own premises a prospectus and notice of sale of Emil Ruedebusch's "The Old and The New Ideal."

The notice caught the lynx eye of two or three committeemen who interviewed Mr. Lindsay on the matter and advised him to take the notice out of the window, and stop selling the book. They likewise remarked that the notice might injure the society in its work, especially if any Christian ladies got to know of its contents, not to speak of a probable prosecution at the hands of the police for selling immoral literature. In declining to accede to this request, Mr. Lindsay asked at least one of the gentlemen, although I am sure some others were in a similar predicament, if he had read the book and he replied, as is the habit of the scandal-mongers and purists in literature, in the negative.

Now, why should those gentlemen go into any man's shop and persuade him to stop selling a book? Would it not have been sufficient for them to urge their fellow-committeemen to notify Mr. Lindsay that he must not sell the book in their hall and at their meetings? If a prosecution should come about—and that is not very likely in Glasgow today,—by taking such a step they would be legally innocent. Mr. Lindsay, himself, would be the sufferer, or the gainer, as I think.

Have the gentlemen "freethinkers" (who are only worthy of being remembered by their initials, L., B., R., and F.,) forgotten all about the victorious struggles for freedom of speech, for freedom of printing and vending papers, books and pamphlets in Great Britain in the past? Do they not know that the efforts of Hetherington, Carlile, Holyoake, Bradlaugh, Foote, Ramsay and others have enabled them to enjoy their "Freethinker," "Agnostic Journal," "National Reformer" and other radical papers today? Do they think it in keeping with the principles of freethought to discourage the publication of literature, or to discountenance discussion on the most sacred of topics—even that of sexual relationship? Apparently they do, and I can only pity the weak-kneedness of their concept of freethought.

Is the "Old and The New Ideal" worse reading than the "Bible" upon which they have concentrated the largest portion of their spleen in the past; done everything they could to prove "the old book" with its ancient ideal no revelation from God, and anything but inspired? If not, why do they argue thus: "Yes: we say to all Christians—to all men, there are so-called moral lessons in the Bible which we believe, and which many admirers of it believe, are unfit to be read to their, and our sons and daughters; but we likewise believe that, by reading the Bible with all its distasteful and suggestively immoral passages, they will thereby come to reject its teachings as unworthy of the reverence which their fathers had for it." And is this other book,—"The Old and the New Ideal," so shockingly bad, so overpowering to the general moral sensibility that S., B., R., and F. and T. must do their best to prevent human eyes in their enlightened circle, from seeing it or reading it? Yet, they will call themselves Freethinkers. Ruedebusch has well classified this class of creatures among the "No-thinkers."

This puny attempt to suppress discussion on this very important and interesting topic is useless. Year by year the advocates of freedom in sexual relationships are increasing, and the propaganda, I am glad to state, increases in proportion. The Legitimation League of London has now begun an earnest campaign with lectures and the publication of the "Adult" for the advancement of freedom between the sexes, and it will not be the stereotyped brains of some Glasgow Secularists who can stem the tide of progress—mentally, socially or sexually.

The following correspondence between Mr. Lindsay and the Secretary will help to explain the situation:

May 27, 1897.

SECRETARY GLASGOW BRANCH NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY:

It has been alleged by some members that the interests of the Branch are imperiled by me, publicly, in the ordinary course of business—by advertising a book entitled, "The Old and the New Ideal"—subtitled "A Solution of that Part of the Social Question, which Pertains to Love, Marriage and Sexual Intercourse."

To meet that view I have decided to withdraw from the committeeship, and if the committee by a bare majority think that my advocacy and actions are likely to imperil the interests of the Branch by my membership of the society, please delete my name from the membership roll also.

In this connection, I wish it understood that I will apply for the position of Literature Stall-holder on the approach of each session and thus far place myself under your direction.

More than the foregoing I cannot do, consistent with my idea of the logic of Freethought. DAVID G. LINDSAY.

May 28, 1897.

DEAR MR. LINDSAY: Your letter of 27th inst. was duly laid before the committee of the Glasgow Secular Society and Branch of the National Secular Society.

The committee regret your withdrawal from the society in which you have done much useful work, but as you put the matter, they are reluctantly compelled to accept your resignation. Yours faithfully, THOS. ROBERTSON, SECY.

June 2, 1897.

SECRETARY GLASGOW BRANCH NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY: Considering the phraseology of my note of May 27, yours of 28th does not wholly touch the points therein.

I only resigned the committeeship and for a given reason. What I wish to have is an authoritative note from you or the chairman to the effect that my resignation of the committeeship was accepted and that the committee deemed it advisable to delete my name from the membership roll as my advocacy and actions are likely to imperil the interests of the Branch. I am assured that that is what occured at recent committee meeting. I thought Secularists would understand my written communication if not my oral ones. D. G. LINDSAY.

June 2, 1897.

DEAR SIR: Yours of today to hand. Whoever informed you that the Glasgow Secular Society committee "deemed it advisable to delete your name from the membership book" entirely misrepresents or misapprehends the action of the committee. By your letter of 27th ult. you forced the committee to give an opinion upon the advertisement displayed in your window. Their opinion was that as bookseller to the society the exposure of this sheet in your window, was impolitic and likely to militate against the interests of the society. You told the committee that if this should be their opinion "to delete your name from the membership book." They have given effect to your instructions. Yours faithfully,

THOS. ROBERTSON, SECY.

218 Allison street.

How tardily the correct extract from the minutes came! How easily the committee are forced! as if they could not decide whether the matter was under their jurisdiction or no. Where is their private judgment? D. G. L.

I make no further comment on this correspondence except to say that I give it as received from Mr. Lindsay and leave your readers to cogitate on the prospects of Freethought in Glasgow.

We are now ready to fill orders for E. C. Walker's pamphlet, "What the Young Need to Know.—A Primer of Sexual Rationalism." Also, Sexual Diseases. In Part II. he speaks of the Prevalence and Power of Sex; Clothing, Art and Literature in their relation to the fact of Sex. Price, 10 cents a copy.

To Extend Lucifer's Work.

As stated in recent issues a plan has been suggested whereby it is hoped to raise five hundred dollars to send Lucifer for three or six months to persons not now subscribers. Of this sum one hundred and seventy-two dollars have been subscribed, about half of which has been paid. Since last week the following names have been added:

Priscilla Clark,	$5.00
Mattie E. Hursen,	1.00
R. P. Harrington,	2.00

Contributors to this fund are requested to send names of their friends to whom they wish the paper sent. Our experience has proved to us that money paid for trial subscriptions has been of much greater service to the paper than that given in straight donation. Some of our very best workers have become interested in Lucifer through a trial subscription sent by a friend.

A New Society.

Brother Zeitinger,—see "Voices" column—thinks it is not a "reformed" society that Lucifer is working for, but a new society. In this statement I think he is eminently in the right.

If we take, as one indication, or sign of the times, the late British "jubilee" proceedings by which or in which a very common and very useless mortal whose baptismal name happens to be Victoria Guelph, was made the object of more thought, more adulation, and the cause or occasion or more expenditure of money, than was ever before witnessed on an anniversary of a personal or political nature; or if we take, as another indication, the scenes witnessed and sounds heard at our own political and social anniversary called "Independence Day"—our three days carnival, or national "big drunk;" or if we take the doings of our national congress, and heads of departments at Washington, D. C., ever trying to concoct and practicalize ways and means to increase the burdens of the worker classes and lighten those of the parasitic classes—the drones of the social hive; and if we note such pointers as the national gathering of Christian Endeavorers at San Francisco, and the convention of the National Teachers Association at Milwaukee, etc., etc., we cannot fail to see that the trend or drift of modern human society is not towards a better social system but towards magnifying and crystallizing the old, old feudal system; which means that the masses of human beings were made to serve the elect and select few.

An Englishman who is presumed to know whereof he speaks, puts the direct cost of the Queen's jubilee at one hundred millions of their money, or five hundred millions of our dollars. The indirect costs are probably much greater, and all this at a time when many millions of the subjects of this same queen are perishing of famine and pestilence, caused by overcrowding and bad municipal management, and many millions more are living from day to day with the grim specter "Want" staring them full in the face.

Our American anniversary celebration, just past, was perhaps not so expensive in direct outlay of money but more expensive in cost of life and limb. Here in Chicago the papers report as casualties resulting directly from "explosives" four dead and thirty-six more or less seriously wounded. That these reports embrace a part only of the serious accidents directly resulting from our imitation of primitive savages who take delight in making all the noise possible, is doubtless true. If these figures be taken as a basis of calculation then the killed and wounded during the three days' carnival, taking the country over, will run up into the thousands—equal to the results of a great battle in time of war.

But damage to life and limb is only one of the sad results. In Rockford—a second or third rate town in this state, as per program the city officials spent two thousand five hundred dollars in "fire works." Thousands and hundreds of thousands of families all over the country are out of work and at their wits end as to how to keep the wolf from the door, while these "city fathers," the guardians of the poor, have thousands of dollars "to burn!" (Where did they get these dollars?) Whether burned by public officials or by private wastefulness, many millions of gold standard dollars were literally and designedly burned,—to say nothing of the other millions burned by accident, or by premature explosions. The Chicago papers chronicle an unprecedented number of small fires resulting from this cause, mostly occurring in the homes of the poor. The fire engines were kept busy all day putting out the fires kindled by "fire crackers," "Roman candles," etc.

Many train loads of "Christian Endeavorers" passed through this city a few days ago, on their way to San Francisco, stopping off a day in Chicago to take in the sights. The number of delegates reported at the city of the "Golden Gate," coming from all parts of the country, is estimated at thirty thousand, involving an outlay, direct or indirect, to be finally collected from the hard working masses—who do not go on excursions across continents—of several millions of dollars.

Whether the national convention of teachers at Milwaukee, representing for the most part conservative and reactionary forces—our colleges and universities controlled largely by private wealth and those interested in perpetuating present inequalities; our public school system controlled in the interest of church and state superstitions—whether this expensive convention, too, should be reckoned among our useless or worse than useless luxuries, is, perhaps, an open question; but not so of that other convention alluded to, the aggregation called the Congress of the United States, to which must be added the other officials constituting what is known as the "government" of the United States.

This perennial and self-perpetuating convention or aggregation of forces, as all intelligent and rational people are rapidly coming to see, is incomparably the most costly of all the worse than useless luxuries now indulged in, and paid for by the labor of the masses—the toilers in the mine, the mill, the shop; and by the dwellers in garrets and cellars of the great cities, and on the farm, as well as in the wild lumberman's camp—all, all must pay their tribute.

Of the uselessness and of the devilishness of this giant octopus; this anti-natural, this superstition-reared and ignorance-supported monster called "government," there can no longer be the shadow of a doubt in the minds of those who have made a study of societary problems, but how to eliminate the evil, how to escape the all-grasping tentacles of the governmental devil-fish is the absorbing question for humanitarians to solve.

The writers and workers for Lucifer have made this problem a subject of special study, and some if not all of them have reached the conclusion that the first and most important step to take in eliminating the evils, the despotisms, the slaveries that inhere in our present societary or governmental systems is

THE EMANCIPATION OF WOMANHOOD AND MOTHERHOOD.

This does not mean the political enfranchisement of woman by giving her the "ballot." It means something vastly more important than that. It means nothing less than the absolute ownership and the intelligent control by woman herself, of the function or office of reproduction,—the ownership and control of the creative function which nature gave to woman, but which has been usurped by masculine man. It means that no substantial, no radical reorganization or betterment of human society can take place so long as the mothers of men are slaves, slaves in the most important department of their being,—the reproductive. It means that woman must assert herself, and take the lead in the social reconstruction. It means that woman's intuitions, aided by her enlightened judgment and by the accumulated experiences of all the past, must henceforth direct the race in its upward march, and not the selfish love of domination and of sensuous animal gratification, that has characterized all systems of man-made government.

This, in brief, is the foundation stone of the New Society that Lucifer is trying to build; a society that, as we think, will practicalize, or surpass, all the dreams of Utopians from Rousseau to Edward Bellamy and Eugene V. Debs. Whether any of us will live to see this dream materialize on the planet earth, is a matter of comparatively little importance. The important thing for each and all of us is to do what we can towards its ultimate realization.

Our English Co-Workers.

Two important communications from Lucifer's English correspondents appear in this issue. The first, on "Contagious Diseases and Governmental Remedies," punctures the pretensions of church state officialism and its proposed remedies for a class of diseases largely traceable to its own invasions of personal liberty, and to its own suppression of needful knowledge, and to false standards of moral purity.

The other communication, that from Glasgow, sent us by the Correspondent of the Legitimation League for Scotland, shows that the English Secularists are having the same trouble over the sex question that is dividing their American brethren into two distinct sections—those who hold to church-state morality and those who demand absolute freedom, coupled only with responsibility for all our acts, as the true basis of morality, or of human ethics. That is to say, Mr. Gilmour shows that among British Freethinkers, as with us, there is a pharisaic element that wants no fellowship with those who assert their right to carry the logic of free thought into the realm of sex-relationships, as well as in the matter of satisfying any other normal appetite or passion. Lucifer's readers will doubtless want to be kept posted as to the progress and outcome of this reactionary movement among the British Secularists who have fought so many battles and won so many victories in favor of freedom of speech and of press, and against inequality of religious and political rights and privileges.

Old and New.

BY ADELINE CHAMPNEY.

In Lucifer No. 664 Dr. Foote takes two columns to criticize the "Old and the New Ideal" by Ruedebusch, and shows conclusively that he is still in the grasp of the old ideal, and therefore cannot understand the new. He says:

"A sexual attraction deserving to be called love disposes one to a pretty constant companionship with its object, and arouses a desire to establish a home and family with 'the heart's desire'."

Under the old, exclusive love-ideal, yes. But in freedom, no! Men and women once emancipated from the "everything or nothing" ideal, will choose each co-operation strictly on their fitness for it, and the business-contract, the joint-home contract, the family-contract will be based on mutual desire and mutual adaptability; as well as the brief associations for mutual enjoyments of amusement, study, music, conversation, or sexual exchange.

Many and many a marriage today is founded upon "a sexual attraction deserving to be called love," where there is no fitness for companionship or family life. In a New Ideal society, where love is free, no companionship or family contract will be desired or entered upon from a mere sexual attraction. It will be founded upon a lasting basis and no "new attraction" will touch it. Dr. Foote cites a case of a man taking his latest flame to a champagne supper, etc., while his partner is deprived of comforts for herself and their child by his outlay. In a free society there will be no danger of such a man being chosen for a family contract—a man who robs his business partner to spend the money on himself!

We would also remind Dr. Foote that when paternity is a matter of desire and purpose, instead of chance and custom, no father will wish to deprive his child of anything.

When Dr. Foote talks of "entangling alliances" he shows that he is still tied to the idea of sexual possession. When a man and woman are attracted by mutual tastes, etc., to establish a joint-home, that contract gives them no claims on each other beyond the "living under the same roof, eating together when both happen to be at home at the same time," and whatever arrangements for mutual convenience and comfort they choose to make.

If they wish to spend their evenings together, to study together, go into society together, that is another matter and they make such arrangements as suit time and disposition. If they wish to enjoy each other sexually, that is a matter of mutual, spontaneous attraction subject to no contracts; and in all these latter associations they have the same claim on each other that they have on any other man and woman. The basis of the New Ideal is free exchange as opposed to possession. The idea of possession must go—before the light of reason and love. The old dream of "all the comforts of home" fades before the new vision of a broader, freer social-companionship, where no man thinks he holds in himself all the desirable masculine qualities, and demands from his wife all the feminine qualities—he one-half of perfection and she the other half!

To the free man and woman every other man and woman has a personal value from the possibility of a helpful and pleasurable mutual exchange of some kind, and they will find their interests and sympathies broadening out toward the "brotherhood of man" where voluntary co-operation is to bring peace and plenty. Is this a dream to be compared to the pleasures of the narrow, walled-in family circle, nodding to the neighboring family circles over the walls, but fearing to open the doors for fear of "entangling alliances"?

One word more. I wish Dr. Foote would give his definition of "liberty." As he uses the term it seems to imply a kind of irresponsibility, which to me, while it may be liberty, is no freedom. What I demand is unrestricted freedom to follow my desires for happiness. Does that mean that I wish to "exercise no restraint on any and every propensity," or to "indulge every impulse without reserve?" Then I shall be a long time finding happiness, or freedom either. We ask for liberty, and our friend assumes that we wish to be enslaved by our fleeting impulses! That man alone has freedom who is hampered by no law, no custom, no prejudice, in the pursuit of Truth; and has the self-poise to use all his powers for the attainment of the truest happiness.

Proofs of Atheism.

BY ZENO.

Were there a god he would permit no denial of his existence. The proof would be palpable to every mind.

If he be good, no evil could exist. If he be bad, he must be overthrown.

If he be as a parent, no war could exist. Parents prevent their young from destroying each other. Yet no war was ever ended except by the killing or subduing of the weaker, and often the more virtuous, combatant.

If he be everywhere, no crime could be plotted and carried out. If he winks at conspiracy and crime, he is our enemy and must be destroyed.

Every deist creates his own ideal of god, and worships it. Idealolatry is no better than idolatry.

The argument that all savages are deists is the worst kind of proof. As the mind develops, theology wanes, until we find it has disappeared in minds of such as Spencer, Darwin, Tyndal, Huxley.

If we must worship let us go back to simon pure idolatry; then if our god does not do what we want him to, we can, like the savages, knock him off his perch.

The statements of Malthusianism lately made in Lucifer are so obviously incorrect as to hardly need refutation. Malthus ransacked all countries for data to prove, not that those countries would sometime reach the limit of their capacity to sustain human life, but that population was then outrunning subsistence, and that "preventive checks" were in operation, the result being want and misery as persistent and continual phenomena, not as a result to be seen in a million years when the earth can hold no more people.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXXVI.

For a moment Mrs. Leland felt faint and dizzy, then her pent up feeling found vent in a flood of tears, with which were mingled those of Osmond. The tension on his nerves had been too great, but both strove hard to conquer their emotion, and for some time they sat in a wordless embrace, reading what they felt in each others eyes. Tenderly her trembling hand smoothed the sunny locks and the pearly drops again gathered in her eyes as she thought how her baby had been permitted to grow and develop, until he stood upon the brink of manhood without the guidance of her hand. His boyhood's years—they had come and gone without bringing her mother's heart the privilege of watching over the tender soul's molding. O, to have been with him! to share his joys and to soften and smooth his childish troubles.

But now? Why dwell upon the past with its many bitterness and trials? Did not the present moment outweigh all the sufferings? all the dark hours of woe? Her boy was still her own, with a soul pure and true. Should she not rather be thankful? With an overflowing heart she drew the boy's face down to hers, giving vent to all the pent-up feelings that were causing her heart to heave and her lips to seek a loving, clinging mother's kiss. Imelda's eyes filled with tears; without another word she gently touched Cora's arm and together they withdrew, leaving the two to enjoy their new-found happiness.

Imelda drew her sister in the direction of the piano, where Norman and Wilbur were still standing, welding the friendship that was to last throughout all the years of their after life. With a little dextrous movement the girls managed to reach the instrument without attracting the notice of the men and only when Cora's rich, sweet voice filled the room with joyous song did they become aware of their close proximity.

Every voice was hushed, every word suspended while she sang. Who was this girl, possessed of such a glorious voice? When the music ceased and the song ended Cora turned and faced her audience. Wilbur was struck with the rare beauty of the face, coupled with a strange sense of familiarity. Imelda smiled, as she caught the puzzled look upon his face,

"It is Cora, Wilbur." That was their introdoction—just as a matter of course—feeling they would need no other. But Wilbur was not satisfied, and begged that Cora would sing again; and she, nothing loath, did sing again. It was the first time this week she had sung—with the anxiety for the possible fate of the absent ones she had had no heart to sing. But tonight she felt happy; so why should she not? Turning over the pile of music her eye fell upon "The Wandering Refugee." The music was sweet, if the words were sad; and as the sad, sweet strains filled the room their influence was felt by everyone present, toning down the exciting joy that filled every heart. Just as the last notes died away a rasping noise was heard at the window. Glancing up they became aware of a white face being pressed against the large pane. Only a momentary appearance, and almost in an instant it was gone. But in that instant both girls had seen it and—had they recognized it? Both pairs of lips breathed the prayer—"I hope not!"

Such a wretched looking, such a deathly white face! Imelda quickly moved over to the window, but no sign was to be seen of a human being. Had they been mistaken? Was it only a chimera of the brain, conjured up by the sad, weird words of the song? Heaving a deep sigh she turned away, shaking her head to the enquiring look of her sister. No one else had seen the face at the window.

At this juncture Alice claimed her right as hostess, and insisted that all should direct their steps to the dining room, there to partake of a warm repast which had been prepared for the hungry travelers. Around the table another hour passed by in pleasant conversation in which many a treasure of mind was unfolded, and where bright eyes sent electric sparks back and forth—sparks that were ever ready to kindle love's fire wherever they might happen to alight, until at length, breaking in upon the running conversation Westcot said,

"Will not someone be kind enough to relate the experiences and dangers of the late journey?"

Wilbur laughed.

"I suspect they are a greatly magnified—in your imagination greater far than in reality. Snow bound we were; that is true enough; not a pleasant experience, I grant you. By the storm-king we were forced to remain in one spot, consumed more or less with anxiety and by impatience to move onward. The change to bitter cold caused us some suffering, but being well supplied with wraps and blankets its keenest edge was blunted. Perhaps the greatest danger that menaced us was the lack of provisions, but that also was warded off.

"It was night when our train was brought to a standstill, and when the morning dawned we saw only a vast unbroken field of snow, spread out before our eyes. The outlook was far from cheerful. Not having thought of such an emergency we had supplied ourselves with no provisions whatever, and the probability was that we would become acquainted with empty stomachs before reaching our journey's end.

"Just opposite us across the aisle our friend here, Mr. Arthurs, had taken his seat and, as misery loves company, it was not long ere he made our acquaintance. Pardon me, Arthurs," laughed Wilbur, "I did not mean that you were so very miserable but that we were all so miserably situated that your kind heart prompted you to lighten our misery by coming closer to us. Well, as the day wore on we all became uncomfortably aware that the inner man (and inner woman) were making us painfully conscious that there were appetites waiting to be appeased. The supply carried by the train was not a large one and the steward was asking shameful prices. Mr. Arthurs made the proposition that we make an attempt at exploration, to see if there was no human habitations near. At first Mrs. Leland would not listen to such a thing, fearing we might get lost, but her fears were over ruled and we made preparation for a tramp through the deep and softly yielding snow.

"Following the base of a hill, near which our train had stopped, we walked about a mile when in the distance we discovered quite a village. It seemed an endless tramp but at length we managed to get there and make our needs known. The villagers proved to be a rough but kindly disposed people and, combining business with humanitarianism, some hours later they brought to the cold and hungry travelers a supply of hot coffee and sandwiches at reasonable prices. This removed the deadly fear of starvation, and although the temperature was very, very cold our situation was endurable. Towards evening of the second day rescue trains arrived. The snow had been cleared from the tracks by the persistent labor of many men who had worked night and day with their shovels, and soon we were once more speeding on our way rejoicing.

"By this time our new friend had proved himself a friend indeed, and having made the discovery that his destination was the same as ours we invited him to make one of our party. And to judge from present appearances he is not at all sorry for having accepted the invitation."

Every eye turned in the direction of Mr. Arthurs, at whose side Edith had found a seat. So deeply was he interested, just then, in something Edith was saying that neither had heard the closing remarks of Wilbur, but at the sudden hush both looked up to find all eyes resting upon them in smiles. A flush mantled their faces, but, joining in the laugh at their expense the matter was quickly disposed of, and now, having all satisfied their hunger Norman said he thought it time they were seeking their respective homes, the night being far advanced, and rest being much needed. Both Wilbur and Mr. Arthurs spoke of going to a hotel, which proposition was most strenuously objected to by the Westcots who insisted that they make their home with them during their stay in the city.

But to this neither of the young men would listen; for this one night, however, they did not refuse to accept the kindly proffered hospitality. Tomorrow they would make other arrangements. Hasty preparations were then made for the departure of the others, and Mrs. Leland's heart contracted painfully at the thought of letting her boy go from her, even for one night. But chiding her selfishness she gave him a good-night kiss. As Norman opened the outer vestibule door and was passing down the stone steps he suddenly stopped. Across the lower step a dark object was lying which proved to be the cold and stiffened form of a man.

VARIOUS VOICES.

P. L. Small, Boston, Mass.:—Enclosed find one dollar in stamps for two copies of "The Old and New Ideal." At last I find a book by a man who understands the subject and gets to the heart of things.

E. A. Guyton, M. D., Grand Rapids, Mich.:—Lucifer is too good a paper to miss, so find enclosed one dollar for which continue it to me. I am glad to find one paper that stands for absolute freedom, and am with you heart and soul in your grand work.

P. R. Skinner, Portland, Ore.:—I enclose express money order for one dollar to continue my subscription to Lucifer. I must have it; I cannot do without it. I will curtail, and simplify my supply of food rather than be without it to read and circulate. If "Hilda's Home" is published in book form I want two copies; five, if I can raise the money. Ever yours for "perfect Freedom."

Robert Nargang, Decatur, Ill.:—Find enclosed one dollar. Some months ago I sent you twenty-five cents for three months trial of your paper. I would rather do without any other publication that I know than Lucifer. It's all good reading except that occasionally some weak, prudish woman or unhealthy man expose their ignorance. However, all should have a hearing; otherwise it would not be in accord with Lucifer's principles.

Mrs. M. R. Fish, May's Landing, N. J.:—After many months of fearful struggles for life's necessities I am enabled to send you a dollar to bring Lucifer's light to my lonely home,—that would be more dark and dreary but for its bright rays. Last year I was able to send three dollars for Lucifer, "Our New Humanity" and books. Lucifer in its new dress and with its words of pearl, is more precious than gold. The extra stamps are for "What the Young Need to Know."

C. J. Zeitinger, Zeitonia, Mo.:—You certainly will get the credit you merit for the very good constructive work you are doing. I prefer to use the word constructive instead of reform; it is a new society you are building, and as I view it, an entire departure from what we have at present, call it what you will. Therefore not reform—don't want to reform the elephant. It seems to me we don't have to destroy the present system by effort (reform work) but as the inventor with a new machine simply shows its good qualities and thus displaces the old, which in consequence destroys itself, because no longer useful. I must confess I have especially enjoyed Lillian Harman's writings and would like you to send me the new radical paper, "The Adult," the April magazine, "Our New Humanity" and "Occult Science." For these I enclose forty cents.

Wm. Broadbelt, New York:—Enclosed find money order for two dollars. I have succeeded in getting you one new subscriber. The other dollar is to renew my subscription for another year. I think you are doing a noble work and the very people you are desiring to enlighten are the most prejudiced against your work. How much would it cost to publish "Hilda's Home" in book form? Think the readers of Lucifer would subscribe the amount to have it published. I would subscribe for quite a number of volumes. It would do great missionary work.

[It is hard to say just what the cost would be, but if a few hundred readers would pledge themselves to take one or more copies the story will be put into book form soon after the last chapters shall have been printed in Lucifer. M. H.]

W. J. Kent, Norman, Okla.:—My time is nearly out for Lucifer. I am more anxious now than ever to renew my subscription since the Green fight is on. I will send you one dollar and fifty cents; that will give me Lucifer another year, and then I want Mrs. Lillian's little girl's picture—cabinet size, if you have one, and we'll be even again.

I wish you could continue the publication of "Our New Humanity." I will give two dollars for the coming year now, if enough can be induced to do likewise. Seems to me that magazine ought to live. Mr. Green don't want any of the free lovers in his ranks. I think it would be a good idea for the free lovers to quit the "Free Thought Magazine" and turn our forces on a magazine which is a real freethought publication—"Our New Humanity." Curious, isn't it, that Truth and Justice are so often unpopular? But I suppose so long as there is a monopoly on the worship of the gods, truth will have to suffer.

Well I was glad you didn't make any remarks on Brother Jones' explanations a few weeks ago in Lucifer. The best criticism is his own article. Seems to me that Dr. E. B. Foote, in his article "One or Many Loves," has the present system of sex relations badly mixed with the "Motherhood in Freedom" system. Another case of putting new wine into old bottles.

The story, "Hilda's Home," if I judge it correctly, is exactly parallel with Lucifer's teaching.

Has not B. C. Walker, in last "New Humanity," dealt Aunt Elmina's pet theory, "Dianism," a death blow?

[Yes, the story would seem to have been written specially to show how Lucifer's ideas on "Motherhood" could be now practicalized, provided only that woman herself will have courage to demand her right to choose and to lead, in all things pertaining to maternity, including choice of paternity. The story is, moreover, a good mirror of human life in many of its most interesting phases.]

The Gordian Knot.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

A Man there was and he loved a Maid,
(Even as you and I.)
But of what folks say the Man was afraid,
And so was she: so they foolishly stayed
Their natural longings—both the Man and the Maid,
(Even as you and I.)

Oh the joy that's lost, the agony that's cost
By heeding what other folks say!
How we forfeit the best there is in life—
And all because of a foolish strife;
Ah! well we know it's a foolish strife
'Gainst what other folks will say.

A Maid there was and she loved a Man,
(Even as maidens will.)
To him her wealth of affection ran
And she loved him as only a maiden can
(When the man she loves is a married man)
With a love that thinks no ill.

For the Man to a Wife was tied for life
With the tie the Law doth knit,
Yet for him alone the maiden pined,
But, awed by the Law which his love did bind,
She never the least relief could find
With all of her woman's wit.

But the man was bold and the Law he defied,
(For fools the Law obey.)
He cut the knot which the Law had tied
And the maiden was happier far than a bride,
So their Love survived which by Law might have died;
(For Love must have its way.)

A Tale of the Geese of Strassburg.

BY E. B. KERR.

Most of the readers of Lucifer are acquainted with the dish known as pate de foie gras. Some of them, however, may not be aware that it is made in Strassburg from the livers of geese. To prepare them for their destiny the geese are kept in darkness and close seclusion, in a kind of cellar, and are fed in a special manner so as to fatten their livers, and make them swell to unnatural dimensions. The unfortunate geese have no other function in life except to supply mankind with pate de foie gras.

A few years ago a movement of advanced thought appeared among the geese of Strassburg. Considerable dissatisfaction was expressed with the position of a Strassburg goose, and a great public meeting was held under the auspices of the Strassburg Gooschood Suffrage Association. The most prominent speaker was a tall, gray gander, who hissed out the following sentiments.

It was, he said, outrageous that any goose should be valued solely on account of one organ of her body. Had not a goose a brain? Had not she a set of beautifully developed senses, and a thirst after knowledge? Yet geese were kept in darkness and ignorance, never knowing anything of the wonders and mysteries of life. They were stunted in mind and body, simply that they might the better satisfy some sensual appetite for pate de foie gras. All the intellectual gifts and physical beauties of a goose had become mere appendages of one of the most despised organs of her body. In conclusion, he said that geese would never take their proper place in the world until they secured self-ownership, and ceased to exist merely to gratify the appetites of others.

There was great applause at the conclusion of this speech, but an old white goose flounced on to the platform and denounced the previous speaker as follows:

It was, she admitted, very necessary that there should be an improvement in the position of geese. But the radical opinions of the last speaker were quite uncalled for. All the legitimate aspirations of geese would be satisfied by Goosehood Suffrage and the Higher Education of Geese. What geese needed most was a better knowledge of Mathematics. As for physical freedom, it was certainly true that a dark cellar was rather a restricted place, but a good course of the Delsarte system of physical culture would preserve the health of geese, and at the same time save their modesty. As for geese going out into the open air, and being openly observed by men and women (in a state of nudity, too), who ever heard of such a thing? It was time to establish a Censorship of Hisses, in order that such indelicate proposals might not again be heard by the young. As for the lovers of pate de foie gras, how could a goose live without them? It would be too cruel to hurt the feelings of those who had their interests so much at heart.

Nevertheless, the spirit of revolt prevailed. Geese began to pine for liberty, and either drooped or openly expressed their discontent. This was very annoying to lovers of pate de foie gras, as it is necessary that the geese should have a sane and healthy habit of mind, in order that the best pates may be produced. The matter was carefully discussed, and it was decided to send missionaries to convert the geese to the doctrines of true religion.

A number of soft-spoken gentlemen, versed in the language of geese, appeared in the dark cellars. They showed the geese how terribly deluded they had been as to their supposed wrongs. They proved to them how much nobler it was to be eaten as pate de foie gras than to eat pate de foie gras, because the eaten practised the highest form of self-sacrifice, while the eaters only gratified themselves. They told them that a bright crown above was reserved for all who had been eaten as pate de foie gras, and that in the next life geese would have a higher place than men.

The geese believed the story. Who could blame them? They had been brought up in darkness, and the key of knowledge had been kept from them all their lives. But an unexpected difficulty soon afterwards arose. Owing to certain fluctuations of popular taste the demand for pates fell off, and consequently a number of the geese which had been fattened for pates were not after all required. These unfortunate geese went to their spiritual guides and pointed out the hardships of their position. It was all very well, said they, to be kept ignorant and blind, if only you were eaten in the end; but it was a little too hard to sacrifice everything to your liver, and then not be wanted after all.

But the spiritual guides exposed the fallacy of these remarks. Surely, said they, it was good that the eaters of pate de foie gras should have plenty of choice. It was a well-known economic law that the value of everything depended on supply and demand, and the larger the supply the cheaper the commodity. By remaining in their cellars, they were making geese plentiful and cheap, and surely they would sacrifice themselves to that extent to please men who had been so good to them. Besides, the larger the supply, the more varied the choice. It was thus made possible for the average man to have a better pate, when there were so many livers to choose from. Finally, the priests pointed out that there was a particularly bright crown reserved for those who had been bred for pates, and then not required. Happy the goose which was made into pates, but still more happy the goose which was not made into pates.

So the revolt of the geese ended—for a time, at least. I am told the geese say they like their lot. They allege that they are not forced to live in their dark cellars, but they only do so of their own free will, for the service of God and the love of Man. It may be so, for, as the proverb says, there is no accounting for tastes.

Contagious Diseases and Governmental Remedies.

BY ORFORD NORTHCOTE.

But, say the advocates of regulation, compulsory inspection would discover the disease in that early stage when its symptoms were not sufficiently advanced to be discerned by the woman afflicted. However true this may be, it is more than counter-balanced by the following considerations.

Sexual intercourse with prostitutes would be robbed of half its physical dangers if men were systematically to take those simple precautions dictated by ordinary demands of cleanliness. But a state-regulated system of prostitution has the effect of lulling men into a sense of security which is by no means warranted, and which encourages indolent men in their indifference to hygienic precautions. Now it is this indifference which constitutes one of the chief agencies for spreading disease. According to Ricord "Women will frequently communicate a gonorrhœa without having it themselves. For once that they themselves suffer from it, they will give it to others twenty times." (Ricord. Lettres sur la Syphilis. p. 47). That is to say that women often act as media of disease from one man to another without becoming tainted with the disease themselves. No one not blindly wedded to the regulation system can fail to see that the false sense of security given may alone account for many victims to disease.

So far then as the non-syphilitic diseases are concerned we see that the case against compulsory inspection is a strong one. But these disorders are comparatively of little importance. They are disagreeable, they are painful, they are contagious. But so also are many non-venereal diseases which are in addition frequently fatal. But syphilis is an enemy of a different order. The sexual organs are the main means of conveying it. But it may also be communicated without sexual congress. If any of the virus be deposited on a bare point of skin, inoculation will take place, provided the subject be not already syphilitic or has not previously had the disease. It may be communicated by a kiss, or by a barber's brush or towel. It is hereditarily communicable. It has secondary, tertiary, and even quaternary symptoms. The poison is expelled from the system with great difficulty, and then only by the use of mercury, whose effects are scarcely less noxious than those of the disease for which it is used as a remedy. Says Fournier, "Having regard for the moment only to the datum of time, I am of opinion that no syphilitic subject should be allowed to dream of marriage until he has consecrated a minimum period of three or four years to medical treatment of the strictest kind." (Fournier. Syphilis et Mariage. p. 108.)

Much of the danger, however, is in the secondary period. Says Fournier again, "The slightest lesions of the secondary period are those which are most dangerous as agents of contagion. And they are most dangerous simply because of their benign appearance. They seem to be of such small importance, and have so inoffensive an appearance, that no attention is paid to them, and their nature is unsuspected, and consequently he who is suffering from them puts himself in the way of communicating the complaint. Let us add, that they may very easily remain completely unperceived." (Fournier. La Syphilis dans la Mariage, p. 169.)

This is the disease at which police inspection is mainly aimed. This is the terrible demon that lurks in apparently the most innocent of sexual embraces.

Now let us see to what extent inspection minimises the dangers. The first phase of syphilis is the incubatory period. After the virus has been deposited in some fissure of the skin, the chancre forms. This incubatory period varies in length from thirty-five to seventy days. M. Rizat observed one incubation of 114 days. (Yves Guyot. La Prostitution, p. 283.)

At least a month then may pass before the chancre shows itself. What is the likelihood of its existence being detected during that time? Apparently it is exceedingly remote. Says Fournier, "So small an affair is a chancre at its commencement that I may without exaggeration describe it as the smallest, the most benign, the most insignificant of all possible erosions. So to speak, it is not anything; it is less than nothing. So far is this true, that the first time, or the first time that we are called upon to show the existence of a chancre under this form and at this period, we are always deceived by it. And it is impossible not to be deceived by it."—Fournier. (Lecons sur la Syphilis. p. 83.)

So small is this lesion, and so great is the difficulty of locating it, that it was formerly thought, and treatises have been written to prove that syphilis never existed in women.—Fournier. (Syphilis chez la Femme. p. 49.)

Further, its development in women is insidious, being usually unaccompanied by pain, so that the physician at this stage can have no aid from the woman he is examining.

Bearing these facts in mind let us examine the manner in which these inspections have, in the past, been conducted. Pelacy, in his report of 1841,* says that the doctors inspect from eighty to ninety women in an hour, or an hour and a half.

Other figures given by M. Carlier† show that the average rate of inspection is one in every two minutes. Mons. Yves Guyot relates having heard M. Routier de Ballemont say with pride, as illustrating the skill of M. Clere, the physician in chief of the dispensary, that he inspected one hundred and twenty women in an hour, or two per minute.‡

Seeing the difficulty of discerning the chancre in its early stages, and noting the fact that the most dangerous erosions are those that appear on any part of the body in the secondary stages, what kind of guarantee is this which pretends to examine women, clothed not stripped, at the rate of two per minute? But this is not all. Since 1841 the speculum has been more or less generally used in these examinations. Now however useful the speculum may be in discovering disease, it may also be a dangerous medium of propagating it. Says Fournier (Lecons sur la Syphilis p. 55) "We should frequently transmit syphilis from one woman to another if we did not take extreme care of our instruments, especially if we did not require our specula to be cleaned under our eyes, washed in several waters, and suitably dried at the termination of each inspection. And in spite of all our supervision, such transmission must sometimes be thus produced." Further it has been demonstrated by Ricord that a single drop of matter taken from a syphilitic wound and dissolved in a glass of water forms a solution, a single drop of which would be sufficient to inoculate a healthy person with the complaint.

A physician examines one hundred women in an hour. The first woman examined has an undiscovered chancre with which the speculum becomes contaminated. The same speculum is used for the remaining ninety-nine women. Improperly cleansed, the speculum is a possible medium of contagion to every one of them. For the one syphilitic woman to be discovered, ninety-nine are to be inoculated with syphilis. This is an adaptation of the lost sheep parable with a vengeance.

This racing speed of examination was not characteristic of French and Belgian physicians only. Mr. Acton when before the House of Lords Committee stated that the English surgeons inspected 150 women in two hours. Nor is the alleged danger of a purely imaginary nature. Dr. Giersing stated that when the inspections were increased in Copenhagen to twice per week, the number of cases simultaneously grew in number, the increase being attributable to infection transmitted from prostitute to prostitute by means of the speculum. (Congres de Genes p. 39.)

In England, too, a similar result was observable. At the Congress of Geneva it was stated that syphilis increased among English troops after the application of the Contagious Diseases Act. (Memoire au Congres de Geneve du Docteur Charles Bell Taylor, t, II., p. 131.)

Assuming inspection to be of any value at all, it is obvious that the more frequently it is made the better will be the results. In England the rule was for inspection to be made once a fortnight. But many things may happen in that time Most of the supporters of inspection say it should be made as often as possible, from twice a week, to every other day, or even every day. But for the women to be inspected, (excepting those who live in the regulated houses,) it is necessary that they should come to the dispensary. And if the inspections are irksomely frequent the women will not attend. M. Lenacre found that the inspection at Brussels which took place twice a week was too frequent because the girls kept away from it.*

He says, "In place of augmenting the subjection of prostitutes we must make their sanitary obligations easy of fulfilment. If they are to be shut up and undressed as M. Lancereaut demands, there would be a general disappearance. They already hide themselves quite enough."

Let us see to where this leads us! The more frequent the inspection, say the doctors, the greater the efficacy of the system. Very good. But the more frequently inspection is demanded the more it is entirely shunned by the prostitutes.

But the police des mœurs are not without a remedy, which is to put all prostitutes, without distinction, into registered houses. Then, whether the inspection be fixed at twice a week or twice a day, it will all be practicable enough. But how get them into these houses? That is quite easy. A law to that effect must be passed. Then any woman discovered practicing clandestine prostitution will be sent first to prison, as a law-breaker, and then to a registered house as a prostitute. If she be only a shop girl eking out her scanty wages by presents from her employer or his manager or highly paid clerks, in return for which she reluctantly yields her charms; if she be a kept mistress who takes in one or more lovers to vary the monotony of her existence she is a prostitute and must be arrested and put under control. In what would such a law result? The clandestine prostitutes would more carefully than ever conceal their avocation. The name "prostitute" with all its social stigma is not one to be courted. Nor would either the kept mistress with polyandric desires or the occasionally offending waitress or barmaid love to think of becoming a prisoner in a registered police governed brothel, where she would have to submit herself to the tyranny of the brothel-keeper and the official brutalities of the inspecting surgeons.

Is it reasonable to suppose that the law would be able to dragoon all these women into the status of official prostitution, where every woman is numbered and catalogued and treated like a slave? Assuredly not! Moreover, every woman who dreaded being immured in a registered house, would, if she became diseased, have every inducement to conceal her disease. She would fear above all things to seek medical assistance.

For of course with such a law, the doctors would be compelled to give information to the police of a diseased woman; as in England they now are compelled to notify cases of small-pox or scarlet fever. The clandestine prostitute would thus have no choice but to conceal and with its concealment to propagate her disease. From statistics given by Yves Guyot, we see that from 1872 to 1880 the new Registration of Prostitutes in Paris fell from 1,014 in 1872 to 354 in 1880; and that those struck off the register as disappeared, rose from 813 in 1872 to 1,935 in 1880.*

Volume of Currency.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

In Lucifer, No. 665, Mr. Chavannes says: "The average of prices is regulated by the ratio of production to the amount of currency." My position is that it is the amount of the basis of the currency which regulates prices; and on that point I have a suggestion to make. Currency includes bank checks. Suppose on a given day business men should refrain from issuing bank checks to such an extent as to reduce the total of specie, bills and checks, to one half what it was the day before. If the theory of Mr. Chavannes is true, prices would be reduced one half. If my theory is true, prices would remain unchanged. I do not believe that if Vanderbilt should buy a railroad on Monday, and pay $100,000,000 for it in a check, adding $100,000,000 to the currency in the country, and if on Thursday that check should be paid by the bank and canceled, subtracting $100,000,000 from the currency in the country, prices would differ in the slightest degree on those days, or that they would differ if the checks should remain uncanceled for a year. Unfortunately I fear that neither Mr. Chavannes nor myself will be able to prove our theories by trying such an experiment.

"THE RIGHT TO WORK."

I will adhere to the old Latin maxim, and will not call Mr. Allen's article "economic rot." On the contrary I am glad to have the opportunity which it affords to express my fundamental idea more definitely, and yet briefly. But before doing so I am free to admit myself an "ancient number," having outlived one socialist community, Brook Farm, fifty years ago, and two others since with which I have been connected; which reminds me of another Latin maxim, "Experientia docet."

"What is this thing society?" Mr. Allen is as much a part of it as anybody; and if I have no right to require from Mr. Allen to give me an opportunity for work, I have no right to require it from any other man. It is convenient to cast individual sins upon the shoulders of "society," but it is not the way to reach the remedy. I am trying to show the constituency that I am writing for, how to reach the remedy, and incidentally the uselessness of invectives which apply to nobody in particular, and which prevent individuals from reforming themselves.

We have received numerous applications during the past two years for "A Discussion of the Social Question" between Dr. Juliet H. Severance and David Jones. We are glad to say that we are again able to supply them. Price 15 cents each. Dr. Severance is a very forceful and able writer, and this is one of her most important productions.

Freethought and Logic.

A word before I begin. And that word is the frequently iterated statement that personal controversy, and everything that has the appearance of personal conflict, is very distasteful to me, and, as I may add, to many of our readers. So long and so far as the personality of the investigators enters as a factor into any controversy over matters of fact and of principle, just so long will there be danger that the real, the useful object aimed at will be subordinated to a desire for personal victory in argument. Desire for truth for truth's sake, is sure to be dimmed if not forgotten by the writers or speakers, if not also by the readers and hearers.

For this reason, among others that might be named, I have followed the advice of old Polonius to his son Laertes, in regard to "entrance into quarrels," or into discussions that may easily take on the character of personal conflict. In most cases I pay no attention to attacks from other journals, and only after repeated assaults, and when not merely my own personal opinions are assailed but also the attitude and purpose of the journal for whose management I am mainly responsible, have I made a set reply.

Most of our readers know something of the attitude of the "Free Thought Magazine" published in this city, towards Lucifer and its work. They know that neither the editor nor the correspondent of Lucifer have sought a controversy with the editor and supporters of the "Free Thought Magazine." All who read both journals know that not until after frequent and long continued provocation was any attention paid by us to the slurs, the insinuations and direct attacks by the editor of the magazine aforesaid. They know that Lucifer was frequently mentioned as "the organ of the free lovers of this country" and that "free love" was spoken of as "this damnable doctrine,"—"this curse of free love," the "most direct road to hell"—"sure road to hell here on earth," and that the opinions of Lucifer's editor "are more pernicious than those of our orthodox friends,"—that Mr. Green "had no thought that her young mind [that of May Collins] had become tainted with free love views until a friend reported that during the Freethought Congress she was very intimate with Lillian Harman," with many more direct and indirect attacks of a like nature.

For one I have always contended that all of the comparatively few and comparatively weak Freethought journals of this country have quite enough work to do, each in its own chosen field, without wasting any of their energy in attempts to break down other workers whose object, like their own, is the enlargement of the area of human freedom and the destruction of ignorance and blind faith in ancient superstitions. With this view of the matter I have sought fraternal relations with all our cotemporaries, and have looked for points of agreement rather than of disagreement, of fraternity rather than of discord. But when a well known leader in the freethought ranks—an editor of one of the most widely known of the Freethought journals printed in the English language, deliberately advises his readers to disfellowship the "free lovers," telling them that if the present official management cannot "cleanse the old Putnam society of Freeloveism" that then the "real Freethinkers of the country, who believe in purity, decency and the marriage institution should come together from all parts of the country and organize a great Freethinkers' association that shall, by its character and high aims and purposes command the respect and admiration of the respectable people of this country,"—see March number of the "Free Thought Magazine," page 118—I repeat, when these and like utterances characterize the editorials of a prominent Freethought editor it would seem that the time has come for those who claim the name to seriously ask the question, What is it to be a "Freethinker?"—in other words,

WHAT IS THE LOGIC OF FREETHOUGHT?

The immediate cause or occasion for asking this question and for writing this article is found in the leading editorial in the July number of the "Free Thought Magazine," entitled, "The Late Samuel P. Putnam—Our Last Word." In this editorial Mr. Green, after quoting one of the paragraphs in his January editorial on the same subject, says:

> Mr. E. C. Walker is one of the ablest and most noted advocates of what he terms "social freedom" in this country. He is one of the editorial writers in Lucifer, and has been, for a number of years, connected with the "Truth Seeker," as an editorial writer, and has, for a long time, been intimately acquainted with Samuel P. Putnam, and next to George E. Macdonald of the "Truth Seeker" is probably best qualified to give Mr. Putnam's honest opinions, of any one living, and this is what Mr. Walker says of them in Lucifer, of May 26th:
> "As a matter of indisputable fact, Mr. Putnam accepted in theory and applied in his life the principles of social freedom. Well posted Free Lovers recognized him as a comrade, and he freely fraternized with them. Wherever opportunity presented, in New York and elsewhere, he attended the meetings of the active propagandists and spoke in defense of their and his convictions. . . . . For instance, I never heard him make a speech in which he was not careful to say that there should be complete liberty for all men and women. He said this in such a way as to show unmistakably that he had in mind all the interests and activities of human life."
> Now it appears to us that Mr. Walker states the free love views of Mr. Putnam even stronger than we did. We ask the reader to go back and read again what we said, and then re-read Mr. Walker's statement.
> It having now been established beyond question that what we stated in the January Magazine is absolutely true, the question occurs: Who is the guilty party, the one who correctly represents the opinions and practices of a deceased person, or the one who misrepresents them?

Very evidently the above is intended as a final settler to my article on the Putnam-Collins matter, published in No. 659 of Lucifer. Whether or not Mr Green fairly and honorably covers the ground in controversy I am quite willing to leave to the unbiased judgment of the readers of the two publications, and if only personal interests were at stake I would freely rest the case by simply referring the reader to the article last mentioned, but inasmuch as many of our present readers did not see that statement, and as the supply of No. 659 is running low, and believing, moreover, that the attitude of Lucifer upon the "logic of freethought" is a very vital question our readers will please exercise the grace of patience while this matter is being probed just a little further and a little deeper.

In this last reply by Mr. Green his characteristic method of argument has been adhered to, as our readers doubtless perceive. Among logicians two things are regarded as specially weak and faulty: First, laying down as a premise that which is not true to fact. Second, drawing a conclusion therefrom that would not follow the premise, if that were true. A good illustration of this vicious logic is the common theistic argument: All progressive and enlightened nations are Christian nations. Therefore, all who oppose Christian theism are enemies of progress and enlightenment. The Freethinker's ready answer to this stereotyped argument is: False as to premise, and inconsequential as to conclusion, even if the premise were admitted true as to fact.

Now, then, "who is the guilty party?" Who is it that states falsehoods for facts and then draws unfounded conclusions therefrom?

First. Mr. Walker is not an "editorial writer in Lucifer," and if he were such, that fact would not help Mr. Green. Mr. Walker states the matter as he sees it, and speaks for himself alone, and would do no more if he were one of the editors of Lucifer.

Second. In my article I stated the facts as I saw them, and as I still see them, saying that I had no evidence that Mr. Putnam was ever a "free lover," as I understand that term. Nevertheless, for the honor of manhood and for the hope of humanity, I should be glad to know that he was, in life, a conscientious, consistent, scientific, logical "free lover;" for, as I think, no higher encomium can possibly be accorded to the memory of any man than to say that he was a worthy champion of Love in Freedom.

So much for the premise laid down by Mr. Green, but, as our readers well know, I was careful to point out that if it could be shown that Mr. Putnam was really a free lover, in theory and practice, that fact could have no connection whatever to or with the manner of his untimely death.

The simple unvarnished fact seems to be that Mr. Green, and those who endorse his position in this controversy, take the view that "free love" means neither more nor less than gross sensualism, selfish animalism, or what is commonly called "libertinism." Where do he and they get their right to such use of these words? Do the lives of Ezra H. Heywood, Mary Wollstonecraft, Percy Bysshe Shelley and other typical social radicals, warrant such use of these words? If the social radicals were to adopt the unkindly and pharisaic tactics of Mr. Green and his helpers, they would say that he and they get their ideas of free love direct from their own inner consciousness, or from what they know they themselves would do if the restraints of law and conventionality were removed.

I say, if the social radicals should descend to the methods of the "Free Thought Magazine" they would thus retort, but for one I hope and trust they will never do this. On the contrary I hope they will give Mr. Green a fair and impartial hearing—treat him far better than he treats us. Sometime since he offered, in Lucifer, to send a copy of his January issue free to anyone who cared to read what he had to say on this question. I hope all who have not read that number will accept his offer, and see for themselves how near this champion of marriage morality comes to proving that free love is one of the "primary causes that brought him [Mr. Putnam] and his young associate, Miss Collins, to their deplorable and untimely death, and disgrace on the liberal movement."

Not only do I advise our readers to hear Mr. Green, but I earnestly advise all who can afford it to subscribe for his magazine. He is now offering it at the very low price of fifty cents a year, hoping thereby to increase his subscription list to twenty thousand. Instead of cherishing ill-will towards the "Free Thought Magazine," on account of its illiberal and unfair treatment of social radicals I sincerely hope its subscription list will increase, and not stop at twenty thousand. With all its unfairness and illiberality it is doing good work in pulverizing theologic superstitions, and also in the line of aiding the movement to which Lucifer is mainly devoted. It is the history of all attempts at suppression, through misrepresentation and persecution, that these attempts defeat their own object. Lucifer has reason to thank Mr. Green for the advertisement he has given us, resulting in a considerable increase in subscription list. We also thank Mr. Chas. C. Moore, of the "Blue Grass Blade," for the many left-handed compliments he has given Lucifer and its conductors—causing his readers to investigate for themselves as to whether free love as taught by us is the "black beast" that its self-righteous judges have described it to be.

If possible, the "Logic of Freethought," from a non-personal standpoint, will be still further elaborated in next issue of Lucifer.

New Theory of Disease and Cure.

Our old friend, S. R. Shepherd, of Leavenworth, Kansas, has advanced a new theory of disease and cure, based upon the idea of unity and simplicity instead of multiplicity and complexity as in existing theories. He goes back to first principles, to the root of things, and, as he says, "unifies the multiplex."

In place of a legion of distinct diseases, each with a specific remedy, he holds that there is primarily but one disease—congestion or cold—all so-called diseases being causative or secondary manifestations—effects—symptoms.

Congestion the trunk—consumption, cancer, insanity, etc., the branches. Destroy the trunk and the branches fall—remove the cause and the effect disappears.

Congestion being the universal cause or condition of all abnormal manifestations suggests one universal curative process, revealed by nature in the sneeze and its attendant sweat which is her first effort to "break up" incipient congestion. The remedy to be intensified in proportion to advanced, chronic conditions and power of resistance.

His cure is the application of that universal solvent, heat, (which is a form of electricity and life,) and water by way of potation, hot baths and sweats, eliminating poisonous and dead accumulations, weakening the patient and bringing every torpid, paralyzed nerve back to the acute sensation and functional activity of infancy—a sort of re-creative process; going back to nature, back to living, vital union with the quickening, pulsating forces of organic life.

He claims that consumption and cancer, for instance, are basically the same—branches of one trunk—developed from a common cause or condition—congestion, cold, stoppage of assimilation and elimination and cessation of the fine nerve functions of life—and call for the same remedy—the "breaking up" of torpid, dead conditions as the heat and water of spring break up and melt the congelation or congestion of winter and start life anew.

The union of heat, water and air with earth (or the body) produces life, he argues. He suggests that as good a way as any to apply the remedy is to drink freely and lie or sit in a room steamed up to from 115 to 130 degrees according to stubbornness of congestion or torpor.

He defines disease as that congested condition of body and morbid state of mind which is back of, and the cause of, all abnormality, and cure as that process sufficiently active and fundamental to break up those conditions.

He calls it the "breaking-up-sweat cure," the idea being, by a purely natural process, to cure or remove all forms of abnormality by simply "breaking-up" the foundation upon which they rest, thus restoring sensation, circulation and functional life and activity.

Many of Lucifer's readers will doubtless recall the teachings of Doctor Samuel Thompson, one of whose maxims was, "Heat is life, cold is death;" and one of whose principal methods of cure was the steam bath. From my own observation and experience in the treatment of diseased conditions of the human body I can freely endorse the theory of our Kansas correspondent, whose ideas are herein given (chiefly in his own words) and would heartily recommend the adoption of his suggestions, whenever medical treatment seems to be called for.

In this connection attention is called to an offer made by a good lady physician of Chicago who has agreed to donate to Lucifer's "Extension Fund" a number of copies of a little book giving in detail, "How to Cure a Cold," by a practical application of very similar thoughts in regard to the cause and cure of disease. Though often sold at much higher price this little book will be sent post paid for five two-cent postage stamps.

Our Conservatives

BY C. L. JAMES.

It is to the credit of Lucifer's consistency in giving all sides a hearing, that so much of its space has been occupied lately by such conservative communications as those of Dr. Foote and Mr. Parkhurst. But unless such writers can put old ideas in a newer dress they would do better to address some journal whose columns are open to nothing more novel. I had intended a somewhat lengthy reply to Dr. Foote, but he has so well answered himself in his last, that I will offer only these additional suggestions.

"Nature makes no mistakes"—not only in this sense, that Nature operates without reference to human interests, with reference to which only mistakes can be alleged, but also in this sense, that experimental study of Nature furnishes the sole rule by which human interests can be served. There are, as Dr. Foote says, born polygamists, jealous but inconstant; born polyandrists, of like temper but different sex; born varietists; and, doubtless, born monogamists. Now, in a state of freedom, like must find like; and that kind which is not adapted to survive will perish through the struggle for existence. But in a state of female slavery, polygamists beget upon unwilling monogamists sons who perpetuate their kind, and daughters, of whom at least a certain proportion are polyandrists, which means, under our system, prostitutes. Thus the system perpetuates its own evils—matrimonial rape, prostitution rape, jealousy and murder. Abolish it, and of those conflicting tendencies thus breeding together, the weaker will disappear. That is the whole philosophy of variety. Dr. Foote does not surely imagine that we varietists would force, or even urge, variety upon anyone. We say only that prohibitions of variety, legal, social, or religious, mean, in practice, marriage-and-prostitution-rape. We are anxious to remove these great evils in the only way they can be removed. Therefore we combat the prejudice against variety. And for that purpose we give our experience—that variety does not produce the evils alleged; that varietists, released from restraint, are good companions, and everlasting lovers; that their children are born well; that their domestic life is happy; that, among them, common love of one object is not a cause of hate but sympathy. And, because this is experience, not dogma, we impose it upon no one. Let those who feel moved to, try it—voila tout.

It cannot be that Mr. Parkhurst thinks his "Sociologic Lessons" new. Lessons are given in subjects already systematized, by persons versed in them, to persons ignorant of them. Mr. Parkhurst, then, supposes that Lucifer's readers are not familiar long since with all he has said,—and the answer. I can imagine no better plan to show the contrary than offering, by way of parallel, the following:

THEOLOGICAL LESSONS.

No 1.

Nothing can be made by nothing. Therefore what is either always has been or had a Maker.

No. 2.

What is, has not always been. I was not, sixty years ago. Therefore what is had a Maker.

No. 3.

The Maker of anything cannot put into it what he has not got. But there is intelligence in what now exists. Therefore the Maker of what now exists has intelligence.

No. 4.

Intelligence is threefold, implying subject, object and consciousness. Therefore the Maker of what now is, is Three in One.

No. 5.

Goodness exists now. Therefore the Maker of what now exists is good.

No. 6.

Goodness is opposed to evil. Therefore the Maker of what now is must punish the doers of evil.

No. 7.

The greatest of evils is to conceive wrongly of the Creator. But the Creator is threefold. Therefore he must send all to hell who do not believe in the Trinity.

I could easily go on thus to No. 1001. But I have said enough to illustrate the fallacy of Mr. Parkhurst's method, which necessarily vitiates his conclusions. It is the method in vogue before Bacon,—the method of reasoning syllogistically from commonplace assumptions. It is the oldest method in the world, because the most simple and obvious. Everybody, accordingly, knows all about it, conclusions and all. "Lessons" which embody it are a perfect case of "teaching one's grandma to knit." It is fit only for conservative polemics against new truth. All who have been initiated into a newer and better method know that new truth can be discovered thus only in the pure mathematics, where we start with absolutely definite ideas. In all other studies we have to start with ideas more or less indefinite. To syllogize with them is only to get further away from truth. We must improve them by observation and experiment. And, in so doing, we must discard the naked, barren diction of geometry; which no inductive philosopher introduces into anything else. All this Mr. Parkhurst knows, when his prejudices do not govern him. In sexual science, he has done excellent service by discarding arbitrary assumption, prohibition of observation and experiment, and conservative jargon. If he adopts a different style of reasoning—the style of a fifteenth century schoolman—in economic matters, that is because here he has no new ideas, and because the old ones can be made to look as if they had a case against the new only by clothing them in the pseudo-scientific robes of a philosophy obsolete, like themselves.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXXVII.

Norman's cry of alarm soon brought the others to his side. To the question, "What shall be done with him?" Alice replied,

"Bring him in immediately."

So the inanimate form was lifted and carried inside, not to the heated rooms but to one where the fire had gone out, leaving it cold and chill. Imelda and Cora stood with clasped hands, a frightened look in their eyes; looking at each other, expecting what they dared not think or breathe aloud.

The body of the unfortunate man had been carried past them without either having caught even a glimpse of the white face, leaving them in cruel uncertainty as to the identity of its owner. Norman spoke of procuring a doctor when Paul Arthurs spoke:

"With the kind permission of all present I offer my service, as I am a physician." This was news, and under the circumstances a very agreeable surprise. The offer was most gladly accepted. Requesting Wilbur and Norman to lend their assistance Doctor Arthurs began the work of trying to resuscitate the seeming dead body, and for two long hours the three worked hard and faithfully. When they had about given up all hope of recalling the fleeting spark the discovery was made that the blood was beginning to circulate while faintly perceptible respiration gave hope of returning consciousness. After a thorough cleansing the body was wrapped in a soft, warm blanket and put to bed. The chances now were that a life had been saved, but—to what end?

The young physician had made a sad discovery, one which indicated that at best the patient was the victim of an incurable disease. He who lay before them unconscious of his condition, was but a boy in years but already a physical wreck, through the indulgence of a most pernicious sexual habit. Hollow eyes and sunken cheeks told the sad tale. The drawn, white face was encircled by clusters of dark, curling hair; in health he evidently had been a handsome lad. Now his appearance was anything but prepossessing.

"There we see the result of ignorance on the part of some one" spoke up the young physician. "The ignorance of parents in regard to the meaning of childhood, or the ignorance of a boy who did not know, or understand, the meaning of life, and the right uses of life-giving organs and forces."

Neither of the young men had a word to say, but stood with eyes riveted on that ghastly face. Why did that face seem so strangely familiar? and while they looked this strange feeling grew. Like a flash a revelation came to both and their eyes met in a sympathetic glance. Norman became white to the very lips. In Wilbur's eyes was a troubled look, as he met the glance of the other, but across that motionless form he extended his hand to the other who without a moment's hesitation placed his own therein. It was like a compact, this involuntary action, and in that silent clasp there was something conveyed that told to each that they had drawn a step nearer to each other; that in the future they would stand still closer as friends. Wilbur turned to the young physician, pointing to the prostrate form,

"We have made a discovery!"

"And which is——"

"That this unfortunate young man is Frank Ellwood!"

"Frank Ellwood? Who is he?"

"The brother of the sisters, Imelda and Cora Ellwood."

"Ah!" The word was long-drawn and hesitating. Paul Arthurs did not as yet understand; so, briefly as possible, Wilbur related just enough to enable him to grasp the situation.

The young doctor's face became sad and overcast. O, why is this young life blighted? Why should this burden be laid upon those young and tender shoulders? But he felt it would not be for long. Disease, with its fatal clutch, had fastened upon the vitals of the unfortunate young man, and it was only a question of a very short time until the fell destroyer would claim the victim for his own.

When an hour later, with returning consciousness Frank opened his eyes it was to find two fair faces bending over him, faces wherein only love and compassion was to be seen. While Imelda gently brushed the dark hair from the pale face Cora took his hand and laid her face upon it. In his weakness he saw but did not understand. As if their presence brought him peace and comfort he again closed his eyes and soon the regular breathing told that he was in the land of dreams. Gently, lovingly, the sisters nursed the erring brother back to life, with never a word of reproach for the wasted past. They understood only too well their task would be of but short duration, and when the paroxysms of coughing shook the weakened frame it was all they could do to stay the tears that would well up in their eyes.

But soon the time came when he asked to have their joint presence explained, and it was Cora who told him all—all the bitter struggles and experiences of both their lives; of the heavy overhanging clouds, but which clouds were now beginning to show their silver lining.

Frank made no comment. He seemed broken in spirit as well as in body. The once strong and healthy young athlete seemed now only to desire rest and quiet, and when the glad spring time came with its new life and budding joys, its sunshine and song, they folded the waxen hands upon the pulseless breast, decked his coffin with the first sweet flowers of spring and laid the emaciated body away from sight.

Poor boy! Wayward and reckless from his childhood up he had plunged headlong into all the vices that lure passionate youth from virtue's path, and yet—had he sinned more than he had been sinned against? If he had erred, if he had gone wrong, surely he had paid the forfeit. It was a heavy price, that of his young life, and it ill becomes us to sit in judgment upon him. Lawrence and Alice had insisted that he remain an inmate of their home, and a bright sunny room had been placed at his disposal, where he remained until the end.

In the meantime much of interest had transpired, ere the dawn of that sad spring morning. On that memorable night that had brought so much of joy, and also so much of pain—the finding of the long lost brother—our friends had separated as they had at first intended doing, with the difference that those departing had remained a few hours longer at the Westcots than they had expected. With the feeling of uncertainty as to the fate of the frozen man none experienced a desire to leave until the news came that he would recover, temporarily at least; and when the suspicions of the sisters had proved to be correct—that the unfortunate stranger was indeed their brother, so long dead to them—then, as the hour was very late, whispering words of hope the goodnights were at last spoken. The Wallace sisters with Osmond and Norman as escorts were rapidly driven to their home; Edith's hand had been held just a little longer and closer by the young physician than would seem to have been necessary, and Mrs. Leland had held her boy very close as though the separation about to take place was for an unknown period of time, instead of only one short night,—but finally they were whirled away over the freezing snow, and in due time deposited each at their respective doors.

Mr. Wallace did not often inquire into the doings of his daughters. Long since he gave over the attempt to control their actions, feeling that they could well be trusted. On this occasion, however, the hour had been so unusually late when they had come home that he could not refrain from asking where they had spent the evening, or rather night, as it was in the "wee sma hours" that they had sought their room. A moment Edith hesitated, then,

"At the Westcots—they are entertaining visitors from Chicago, the belated trains causing us also to be late."

"What possible interest could these strangers have for you that you should remain so late?"

Edith again hesitated before answering. Should she tell the truth? It was extremely distasteful to this pure minded girl to speak a falsehood. She felt she could not possibly keep the fact a secret that her brother was in the city. The sisters exchanged a quick apprehensive glance, then endeavoring to appear calm as possible Edith said:

"The interest might possibly be greater than you think, and you will perhaps agree with me when I tell you that one of them bears the name of Wilbur Wallace."

Contagious Diseases and Governmental Remedies.

BY ORFORD NORTHCOTE.

[Concluded from last week.]

It has been urged that prostitutes do not object to inspection. It may be that many of them have no particular objection to being medically examined; they can scarcely have more repugnance to that than to the embraces of any old man or diseased wreck being forced upon them by the mistresses of the brothels, but what they do object to is the imprisonment and forcible location in hospital which results from inspection. Bearing in mind that the public idea of a prostitute is that she is a woman to be kicked into the gutter if necessary, it is not surprising that the hospitals devoted to the case of diseased prostitutes are institutions dreaded like prisons. As described by those who have seen them they are for the most part horrible dens, overcrowded, badly ventilated, and remarkable for a lack of decency in their appointments. Add to this the prison-like regime that pertains and it is no matter for wonder that women dread the inspection which may be the forerunner of such imprisonment.

Another difficulty in the way of enclosing all prostitutes in registered houses is that men do not always desire to enter brothels. If it be a fallacy in economics, it is certainly not a fallacy in morals, that the demand creates the supply. Why men's desires run counter to the official segregation of women in registered houses is fairly obvious. The implicit obedience usually demanded of the inmates, the privilege of refusal not being allowed even where the most repugnant of clients is concerned, robs sexual intercourse there obtainable of every vestige of romance. And most men prefer that some resemblance to wooing and winning shall characterize their amours even when they are of a mercenary nature. A meeting with a clandestine prostitute can be made to resemble an intrigue; an impossibility where the inmates of a brothel are concerned, however beautiful they may be, and however luxurious their surroundings. Free men prefer intercourse with free women rather than with slaves. So that the efforts of the police to enclose all polyandric women in brothels would continually be rendered abortive by the desires of men for women not so enclosed.

An additional advantage men have with clandestine prostitutes is that these women, not being compelled to accept the advances of every client, may exercise some choice, and not submit themselves to men whom they have reason to suspect are diseased. But however charming an inmate of a brothel may be, a man who intends to enjoy her can never be assured that she has not previously had thrust on her, in spite of her repugnance, the embraces of an obviously syphilitic client. That this does constitute an additional danger is borne out by facts. M. Bols, a burgomaster of Brussels, in 1881, backed his proposition for the regulation of prostitution by a table of figures, which, curiously enough, gives the percentage of diseased women from the registered houses as greater than that from the isolated class, in the proportion of forty-nine to thirty four per cent. In England again, the Contagious Diseases Acts were not proved to be beneficial. For statistics the reader may be referred to Yves Guyot's monumental work* on Prostitution, but briefly it may be stated that the results in no wise justified the existence of the Acts. The Army Medical Report for 1872 says:

"The fact remains that the mean rate of admissions for gonorrhœa during the eight years 1865 to 1872 is higher in the protected stations than in those which are not protected."

It has been urged that in 1873, when the system had got well under way, a marked diminution of diseases was recorded. But this is easily explained. In that year Lord Cardwell issued an order to stop the pay of soldiers suffering from venereal disease. This order led to concealment of disease by the men, and also induced humanely minded army surgeons to misrepresent the nature of the diseases or to pass them as cured before they really were so, in order to secure the men their pay. All that the Acts can be said to have done was to diminish the cases of non-syphilitic disease, or rather to diminish the cases returned as such. In spite of this decrease, the proportion of men constantly ill with syphilis remained the same after the Acts were passed as before.

The Royal Commission in its report for 1871, five years after the passing of the Act of 1886 concludes thus:

"It is in no wise proved that any diminution of the number of venereal cases in the men of the army and navy is attributable to a corresponding diminution of cases of illness resulting from the application of periodical inspections of the women with whom these men have relations."

In the enquiry of 1881 Mr. Fowler said to Surgeon General Lawson:

"A man runs more danger of catching true syphilis in subjected stations than in others?" Surgeon General Lawson was obliged to answer "Yes." (2. 1801—1809.)

The statistics again, were rendered more favorable to the Acts than otherwise would have been the case, from the fact that when a regiment was going to a station under the Acts, the men were examined previously. This was not done with regiments going from a subjected to an unsubjected station. The subjected stations therefore had the advantage over the others, inasmuch as no syphilitic soldiers were ever allowed to enter.

The arguments here adduced against the compulsory inspection of prostitutes as a prophylactic measure against venereal disease should make its advocates pause. I know they will instantly exclaim "Look at the condition of our army in India as compared with that of the armies of the continent!" It is however to be remembered that there are elements of difference between continental armies and ours which render the comparison an unjust one. Not only is our army much smaller than that of either France or Germany, but it is quite differently constituted. The conscript makes no consideration of character in its selection. The consequence is that the French and German armies are much more representative of the average character of Frenchmen and Germans than ours is of the average character of Englishmen. While therefore our soldiers are in the main recruited from the lowest moral and intellectual types of able-bodied men, continental armies include in their ranks citizens of every grade of moral and intellectual fibre. Now an ignorant and drunken soldier of whatever nationality is much more liable to contagion from venereal disease than is an intelligent and sober one. Taking into consideration therefore the facts that we are, as a nation, more intemperate than either France or Germany, and the allied facts that English soldiers are even among Englishman not noted for sobriety, we may readily see why our army compares so badly with continental armies in the statistics of venereal disease.

If official regulation of prostitution can do nothing towards stemming the syphilitic tide which threatens to flood civilization with a taint which carries scrofula, consumption, lunacy, and probably cancer in its insidious workings, what remedy can be offered? Now, however or wherever the disease originated, and the discovery by Prof. Parrot of syphilitic osteophytes in bones found by Dr. Prunnieres in the dolmens of La Dozere, which bones belong to the neo-lithic period, points at least to the fact that its origin is of very ancient date—there can be little doubt that the modern system of civilized prostitution is a potent factor in its propagation. Any kind of mercenary sexual intercourse of necessity eliminates affection from the sexual relationship. Where on the one side the object is money, and on the other side mere satisfaction of crude physical desire, affection cannot enter. As a consequence, so that the prostitute receives her fee, and her client obtains his physical satisfaction, neither is moved by the consideration of any probable results which may accrue to the other from the intercourse. If the man convey a complaint to the prostitute it is of little significance to him. The callousness, which is bred by frequent chance mercenary sexual relations is of a kind which creates indifference to the subsequent welfare of the woman with whom the sexual bargain is driven. With the woman this is not less the case. Not only are feelings of affection for her client absent, but often also there is on her side an absence of physical desire, her sexual enjoyment being simulated from mere commercial motives. Further, she is aware that she is held in contempt by the world in general and also by the very man to whose sexual pleasure she is contributing. As a result, her natural feelings of pity are perverted, and, far from concerning herself about the future health of her client, she may even take a fiendish delight in the knowledge that she is probably contaminating him with disease.*

Prostitution thus being observed to contribute to venereal disease, the popular cry is raised every decade or so to suppress or at least to control it. We have seen that regulation is devoid of effect; and past experiences of attempted repression show the futility of any efforts in that direction. No attempts to cure the evil are likely to succeed which ignore the fact that prostitution in its present form is the outcome of centuries of Christian moral teaching. Christianity having put the ban on sexual intercourse, tolerating it only in marriage, the idea has been fostered that sexual pleasure outside the priestly or legal sanction is sinful. As a direct consequence, the women who lend themselves to men's sinful pleasures have been branded as outcasts and treated as such. Not only have they been allowed no social standing, but they have been subjected to the most shocking tyrannies and cruelties. As an instance the tribunal of the arrondissement of the department of Paris, on the 4th of August 1791 (the year of the adoption by the National Assembly of the Declaration of the Rights of Man) gave the following sentence.

"The said Marie Louise Bertant, veuve Desbleds, condemned to be conducted by the executioner into all the squares and crossways of the city of Paris, ... upon an ass, her face towards the tail, and on her head a straw hat, with a label before and behind, having this inscription 'Corruptress of youth;' to be beaten and scourged with rods on her bare back by the said executioner, . . . to be branded with a hot iron in shape of a fleur-de-lys on the right shoulder; this done, to be taken to the House of Correction of the general hospital of La Salpetriere, and there detained and immured for the time and space of three years."

Not only were prostitutes thus punished but it was considered a crime to be venereally diseased. An ordinance of James IV. of Scotland, dated the 22nd of September, 1497, compelled persons infected with the "big pox" to leave Edinburg on pain of being branded with a red hot iron on the cheek. At Strassburg it was at one time forbidden to innkeepers, publicans, surgeons and bath-keepers, to treat or receive venereal cases; the hospitals, even those assigned to lepers, were closed to them, and all communication with them was interdicted to the citizens; those that were without resources perished in the streets and in the open country in great numbers.*

Even at the present day, venereal disease is not on the same footing as other disease. Neither the funds nor the medical services of English sick benefit societies are available for venereally diseased members. The hospital accommodation, both here and on the continent, has been lamentably inadequate. In what hospitals there are, the patients have been treated as criminals, with that kind Christian charity about which we hear so much in connection with hospital work.

Before any real attempt can be made to successfully combat the disease, the popular idea of its shamefulness must be destroyed. This idea induces the patient to conceal his disease as long as possible, and it often drives him to the residence of a quack instead of to the consulting rooms of a properly skilled physician. The surest method of combating the disease is to open all the general hospitals to venereal patients, and by kind treatment, not by compulsion, to induce them to remain till cured.

As for prostitution itself there can be little doubt that free love would considerably reduce its present gigantic proportions. When the ring-fence of the marriage system is broken down, and the youth is enabled to enjoy love relations unsullied by pecuniary considerations; and the adult may satisfy his desire for sexual variety with women similarly inclined, prostitution will be hard put to it to exist. The man who then purchased love relations would be universally despised, as one whose personality was not sufficiently attractive to gain the sexual love of women. Such a sentiment would do more to annihilate prostitution than all the scorn that could possibly be heaped upon the prostitute.

It is finally to be remembered by lovers of liberty that they are sanctioning a very grave danger in lending themselves to an agitation for the resuscitation of the Contagious Diseases Acts. Under a system of regulated prostitution the police des moeurs would possibly brand as a prostitute and condemn to undergo regular medical inspection, any woman whose sex relationships were not strictly monogamic. This would give the police a tremendous power, and, with the slackening of the monogamic tie, would place in the hands of the enemies of liberty, a very dangerous weapon. We must not forget how the state of New York suppressed the sexual experiment inaugurated by Father Noyes in Oneida Creek; in spite of the fact that venereal disease was unknown in the community. Under a system of police espionage and inspection no woman belonging to a group of free lovers would be safe. Any such woman would be liable to be seized by the police for registration and medical inspection. Nor should we find the Mrs. Josephine Butlers saying them nay.

"Eternal vigilance," said some sage, "is the price of liberty," and it is as true in this respect as in any other.

*By no means do I wish to insinuate that all prostitutes are moved by these feelings. As a class they are not less amiable than the rest of the sex. But for their environment, which makes of them outcasts, they would probably be distinguished by generous rather than by malicious motives.

The Legitimation League.

At the usual monthly meeting of the League, held at Holborn Restaurant, London, on Thursday evening July 1, Mr. John E. Skuse presided, and a good muster of members and friends attended.

Miss Voltairine de Cleyre made her first public appearance in England, and bearing introductions from Lillian Harman and others, she received (on her own account and also on account of those friends of hers on the other side of the Atlantic) a most enthusiastic welcome. Mr. Skuse alluded to her work in America and expressed the pleasure that advanced reformers in England felt in welcoming her, and in the name of the Legitimation League, Mr. Skuse wished her every success in her coming lecturing campaign. After a few gracefully chosen words of appreciation from Miss de Cleyre, the meeting proceeded to the business of the evening.

Miss Wardlaw Best opened a debate on the subject "Which Sex is the Greater Sufferer Under Present Sex Conditions." Miss Best is a witty and eloquent speaker, and was followed with close attention by her audience, who delighted in the keen rapier thrusts into the armor of the enemy which Miss Best gave. She exposed with logical severity, the fallacies of such poor philosophy as is contained in "The Heavenly Twins" and "The Woman Who Did," and established beyond cavil that while the present sex conditions press severely enough on men, women have to endure far greater and more galling suffering. It is only the FREE woman, concluded Miss Best, who can stand any chance at all of happiness.

Dr. Alice Vickery and Dr. Drysdale continued the discussion, the latter stating that in his opinion the English law was positively infamous and unique in its absence of machinery for the legitimation of offspring born out of wedlock.

Mr. Bedborough dealt with some minor points not touched upon by Miss Best. Mr. Evacustes Phipson introduced some novel theories of his own of a most amusing character, and Mr. St. John (of the Croydon Brotherhood) expressed the opinion that every evil in life can be traced to some restriction. Miss Hetherley made an interesting speech. Her view was that all the extra sexual duties of a wife, such as those of nurse, cook, etc., should be paid for, and that a man should not imagine he wanted a wife, when his real needs were a wife and a housekeeper. Miss Voltairine de Cleyre added an eloquent contribution to the debate, and urged on women the necessity for action as well as complaint. "Be independent if you want independence," "The Woman Who Did—did nothing" were two of her phrases which "caught on."

John Badcock, Jr., emphasized the value of force. "Women," he said, "have a right to all they can get." Mr. Rosenbaum was the only speaker who failed to appreciate Miss Best's splendid address. His criticism was listened to with great good humor by the audience, who laughed heartily at his suggestion that Miss Best was not sufficiently outspoken and that she had not often enough repeated certain expressions. Miss Best made a reply, answering various criticisms; and the customary votes of thanks concluded a delightful evening.

GEORGE BEDBOROUGH, HON. SEC.

In the Arena.

BY MATADORE.

Mr. James has a certain kind of courage after all, but it is of that kind which moved the bull to try to butt the locomotive from the track. He has degenerated from a Falstaff to a common Dogberry. The bull is not worth killing after all. So after calling his attention to a few of his misconceptions, I shall open the fence and let him out.

In ten years reading, I now know of but six anarchistic writers who write intelligently and consistently on that subject. Mr. James is not one of them. It will be very discouraging to the few teachers of anarchism to learn that C. L. James, author of a work on "Anarchy," knows nothing of anarchism. He confuses Individualism, a purely economic doctrine, with Anarchism which is a doctrine of no government. Anarchism means the entire absence of all government,—opposed to monarchism, democracy, aristocracy, etc. As an individualist, I define Individualism as the doctrine that, under equal privileges and opportunities, each person seeking his own personal welfare is most conducive to social progress,—opposed to communism and state socialism. One can be an Individualist and an Anarchist. Communism, when voluntary, is perfectly consistent with Anarchism also. Everyone but Mr. James can see this. He is not certain that individualists have any rights. He is not certain of anything. I know where I stand. I am and have been for fifteen years an individualist. If there were no invaders of the "rights of man" I would be an anarchist also; but as people still invade, I am in favor of some kind of restraint. I deny that, under the present social environment, human rights can be secured without some rule or guide in conduct. I am an "eliminator." I work for the gradual elimination of all unjust and invasive features from our present social system, recognizing the fact that progress is a product of evolutionary change. I can not see the sense in one's being a thousand years ahead of his time.

Mr. James' contention, for the element of force in his definition of prostitution, shows the mistakes one can make who rummages the dictionaries for Latin phrases to sandwich his articles with. Prostitution, Mr. James, means, if it means any thing, the prostitution by a woman of her maternal powers and functions without love and for mere gain. It can and does exist within as well as without marriage. My use of the word prostitution-variety was irony. Sarcasm is lost on Mr. James, and I suppose he will still continue to use the words prostitution-marriage because he seems to have no regard for the feelings of those who still believe in marriage in some form. In Lucifer number 661, Mr. James made an ungentlemanly allusion to all who stand on what he calls the half-way ground. I do not believe in variety as taught by some writers in Lucifer, nor do I believe in law-enforced marriage. I am here again an "Eliminator." I think that all the regeneration, advocated by race-culturists, can be secured by evoluting out of our present system all of the invasive features. Here is where I stand, and I do not propose to be abused by people who use invective instead of argument.

Mr. James did not answer my question because he does not know, not because he is a coward. His placing the greater part of the responsibility on the father, and then denying him child control, shows what fantastical conclusions may be reached by those who have no system. Should one lead Mr. James' nine or ten-year-old child away with its consent, Mr. James would say "good." He, or no one else that I have seen, places any limit whatever to such invasions. I stand to one fixed by nature. You are not certain where you are. According to your theory, you could lead my child away before she had reached the age when reason begins to play some part in willing and doing. You seem to sneer at the idea that one can be a victim of a weak organization. If this is not true, there is nothing in heredity at all. Lucifer may as well turn off the light. I am as certain, as one can well be, that there are persons so constituted that no amount of training and education will enable them to be anything else but victims for the designing and perfidious. Let us teach and train certainly, but we can not change the leopard's spots. Let Mr. James read Maudsley's "Body and Will" and "Body and Mind," and he will have a little more charity for those who differ from him on the so-called "age of consent."

Read up on Anarchism, Individualism, and the Free Moral Agency question; use less vituperation and invective; cultivate a kindlier spirit; and we will get along better in the future, and thereby prepare the way for Anarchism. Let him out.

How to Help Spread the Light.

Friends of Lucifer can greatly assist the cause of sex reform by asking their local newsdealers to send for Lucifer's publications. We have quite a list of well written books and pamphlets which would find a ready sale on news stands and yield the newsdealer a good profit. A good plan is to show your local newsdealer a copy of say "What the Young Need to Know," or "Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs," and ask him to order half a dozen or more copies. Tell him distinctly that he can return all unsold copies within six months and receive his money back for them. There is little probability that he will return any of them if he gives the publications a proper display, because every person nowadays is more or less interested in sexology although countless thousands are still ignorant of the importance of the science.

We are the exclusive importers of those five startling and intensely interesting English books: "Bar Sinister and Licit Love," "Dawn of Civilization," "Rights of Natural Children," "Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs" and "When Love is Liberty and Nature Law." Each one is an intellectual man-o'-war in the battle against governmental and priestly restriction of personal liberty. They are handsomely bound in attractive covers and if properly displayed on news stands would sell rapidly.

Show your newsdealer some of our publications and urge him to write for our liberal terms to the trade. In this manner you can assist in giving a healthy tone to public sentiment which now is ignorant of the deep importance of the movement for the abolition of sex slavery.

Proudhon's "What is Property?"

By unexpected good fortune Lucifer has come into possession of a limited number of bound volumes of Benjamin R. Tucker's translation of Proudhon's great economic masterpiece "What is Property?" No student of economics can afford to miss reading this powerful and intensely interesting book. If we are not mistaken the English translation of this work is now out of print and only a limited number of copies are obtainable. The work, bound in cloth, was sold by Mr. Tucker for $3.50. In a very few years it is likely that at least five dollars will be demanded for a single copy. In order to give the friends of Lucifer a chance to secure this valuable book at a "hard times" price we will send one bound copy to any address in the United States or Canada for only $1.50. Or, better still, we will send one bound copy of "What is Property" and one copy of Lucifer regularly for one year to any address in the United States or Canada for only two dollars. As our supply of these books is not large this offer should be accepted without unnecessary delay. Remember this is the genuine Benjamin R. Tucker translation of Proudhon's famous book, which was formerly sold for $3.50.

Law the Cause, Liberty the Cure.

The series of articles entitled "Contagious Diseases and Governmental Remedies," contributed by our English correspondent, Orford Northcote, and which series is concluded in this issue, should be printed in pamphlet form and given a wide circulation. As such it would doubtless take its place as one of the best demonstrations of the futility of "State regulation of Vice" ever made to the English speaking public. Not only is the futility of such regulation demonstrated but the vastly more important fact that all such attempts at regulation and suppression really produce and perpetuate the evils they are claimed to be intended to mitigate or prevent.

When will mankind learn that "governments," state and church, are instituted and perpetuated not for the protection of the weak against the strong but for the protection of the strong in their schemes to rob the weak; not for the promotion of justice and equality but for the promotion of inequality and privilege; not for the prevention of vice and the promotion of virtue, but, first of all, to give employment to those who do not like to work and who want easy and profitable jobs of governing those who are willing to work; and secondly, to demonstrate the necessity, or the apparent necessity, for the perpetuation of their own existence.

In no way do governments by authority—church and state, secure acquiescence in or submission to the burdens imposed upon their victims so easily and so surely as in and by their invasive regulation of the appetite and the functions of sex, including, of course, the reproduction of the race. The evils of abuse and of misdirection in the realm of sex are apparent to the most superficial observer. Church and state, the priest and the judge, find in this abuse and misdirection their opportunity. They say, "Behold the evidence of human depravity. Men and women are too weak and too depraved to govern themselves in this most important relation of life. Hence the necessity of law and government."

For uncounted thousands of years mankind have been victimized by this specious reasoning. Slowly, very slowly, but it is hoped very surely, a few women and men are awaking to see that the evils of ignorance and misdirection are not removed but aggravated and perpetuated by church-state regulation, and that intelligent self-control is the only cure for these evils. In other words that is the only salvation from the consequences of unregulated sex passion.

Macaulay's sententious saying, "the cure for the evils o liberty is more liberty," embodies a truth not less important to be remembered than that other famous maxim, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

JOHN HAY, who now receives a salary of $17,500 a year as United States ambassador to the court of St. James, finds that "loafing round the throne" is a "durned sight better business" than writing dialect verse.

JUDGE SMITH of Chicago censured a jury last week for failing to agree on a verdict in a burglary case. He said the evidence was as clear and plain as it was possible to make it and he was surprised at the action of the jury. The same day in the same city Judge Goggin discharged a jury for acquitting a prisoner whom the judge thought guilty, saying, "I don't want such a jury here." Trial by jury in Chicago seems to mean trying to guess the opinions of the judges.

JOHN CERWINSKA was fined five dollars and costs by Justice Sabath in Chicago last week for distributing anarchistic literature at a labor demonstration. The Chicago "Chronicle" in noting the fact says: "The wording of the circular is comparatively harmless and the fine was suspended later, as it was shown that the prisoner was a hard-working man." Comparatively harmless! In comparison with what? It is lucky for Mr. Cerwinska that he was not seeking for work instead of being a "hard-working man."

Sociologic Lesson. No. XXXXV.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

OVERPRODUCTION. Overproduction is usually only a relative evil, a smaller benefit than the labor promised to give. The labor is lost; it might have been better applied; but it seldom diminishes the value of the material used. If a farmer's crop of corn is too great to sell, he can at least burn it; it costs him nothing to get rid of it. If weaving mills produce millions of yards of cloth which is not needed, it can be kept until it is needed; and in the meantime the reduced price will benefit consumers. The loss of employment opens the way for other employment. The evil is not in the production, but in stopping production while the surplus is selling. It arises from the want of a systematic employment of labor. So new inventions which give us wealth without labor, often entail much loss upon those whose labor is made useless, simply because there is no constant provision for employment.

Suddenly accumulated wealth often stands in the position of overproduction; it is an apparent or relative evil, failing to produce the advantages which might be expected from it, because it takes time for the new holders to learn how to employ it; yet so long as it is not squandered it is a power in reserve, capable of benefiting the whole community.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXXVIII.

Mr. Wallace, who was just partaking of his morning meal, arrested midway the cup which he was about placing to his lips and stared at his daughter as if he had not heard aright.

"Who? What is that you say?"

"Wilbur Wallace," repeated Edith with slightly trembling voice. Slowly the cup that was poised in mid air was again replaced upon the table.

"Do you mean to say that it is your brother to whom you refer?"

A slight inclining motion of the head was Edith's only answer. She almost feared to look at her father, and when she did so she found the strong man had turned deathly pale; his lips twitching nervously, and presently with a gasping sound came from his lips:

"Wilbur! Wilbur!" and his head sank upon his hand, in which attitude he remained a long while, then slowly, without again speaking, he rose, donned overcoat and muffler and went out into the crisp, wintry, morning air. His manner was a mystery. The girls looked at each other and shook their heads.

In the evening when they again met at the family table he looked more like himself but was strangely quiet, not at all like the Elmer Wallace who was wont to carry himself with an air of such importance and assurance. Even his wife took note of the matter and inquired as to the reason, but received no answer for her pains.

Several days thus passed by. Regularly each evening after supper a span of horses with a dashing cutter drove up to the door; a youthful driver would spring therefrom and would carefully tuck the waiting girls therein and drive away, returning always a little before midnight. Then there was a change. Beside the boyish figure a more manly one had taken its place. Tall and well built, every movement of that form betokened health and strength. At such times the face of another and older man could be seen at the window, watching the figure of the younger man as he sprang to meet the girls. Eagerly he listened to catch the sound of the voice speaking words of greeting to the sisters, watched him tuck the robes closely about them, heard his deep-toned laughter mingle with their silvery ripples, and in a few seconds more they would disappear. Long hours would intervene, but when the tinkling bells announced their return, as though it had been watching for their advent, the face at the window was always there, until the good nights were spoken and the merry music of the bells was lost in the distance.

But Mr. Wallace never asked for his son; though deep down in his heart a longing was making itself manifest. Now that he knew that his first born was once more near him in the same city, to look into his eyes, to clasp him to his bosom, to have a share in his life, was a desire that was daily growing upon him. Yet he could not bring himself to sue for it. Day by day the onging grew stronger until it became almost unbearable. This longing was the more strongly felt when he glanced at his younger children, the result of his second marriage. All of them, the whole four, had not been sent, this season, to boarding school, as they were not at all well, and they had made life anything but pleasant for the rest of the household. The eldest boy, Homer, the father had hoped would soon have been ready to graduate, but the lad showed an unaccountable aversion towards his books. He was surly, sullen and irritable, with a languor of manner that caused the parents to fear that he might be breeding some fever. The others were no better. Elmer was hollow-eyed and nervous. The girls, Hattie and Aleda, were fretful and hysterical to a degree that made life a misery to those about them.

The parents were anxious and fearful, pampering them in mistaken kindness, thereby making perfect tyrants of them all. Only Edith and Hilda would not submit to the whimsical demands of the younger children, and when Mrs. Wallace complained and lamented about the ill health of her darlings Edith would reply:

"Insist on it that they all take exercise every day—exercise of a nature that will tax their strength, and ere long you will see a change."

"Yes, I am sure there would be a change. You certainly are the most heartless girl I have ever met. Compel my sick children to work? I believe it would please you if they should die, for that is what such a course would result in, I am sure."

Mr. Wallace would look at them, then at the bright and cheerful faces of his eldest daughters. Then he would remember the face and figure of the stalwart young man whose movements he had of late been watching from the window and would wonder how it was that the children of the delicate Erna should be healthy and robust while these younger children, whose mother was apparently so strong and healthy, should be so delicate, apparently candidates for early graves. More than ever he longed to be reconciled to his first born. But his stubborn will would not bend. Had Wilbur come to him he would have welcomed him with open arms, but that he should go to Wilbur his iron will and stubborn pride would not permit. So he stifled the voice of his heart, only he could not cast out the longing therein, and day by day he grew more restless, dissatisfied and irritable while the state of affairs at home grew daily more unpleasant.

One day, it was clear and frosty, Mr. Wallace was on his way home to dinner, walking along at a brisk pace. Part of his way lay along the railway track, when at a short distance ahead of him he saw a boyish figure in which he recognized his son Homer. The boy was walking at a very slow pace with downcast eyes seemingly forgetful of his surroundings when the rumbling of the wheels of an approaching train was heard. The boy however, paid no heed. Mr. Wallace gave a cry of warning but the boy was so lost in thought that he never heard. The train was approaching at an alarming rate of speed.

"Homer! Homer!" the distracted father cried, but unconcerned the boy walked on. Mr. Wallace started on a run but despaired of reaching him. He repeated his warning cry when suddenly the boy tripped and stumbled, almost fell—recalling him to himself, but the nearness of the approaching train, the certainty of impending fate seemed to stun him and he stood stock still, with white set face, awaiting the coming shock. Mr. Wallace calling again, "Homer! Homer! quick aside," covered his eyes with his hand so as not to witness the dread disaster.

The next moment the train went speeding by, sending the icy chills through his veins. Dreading to look up, expecting to see only the mangled remains of his child Mr. Wallace with white lips and blanched face, opened his eyes to see a stalwart, manly figure, a face encircled by clustering dark locks, lit up by piercing black eyes, and in his arms holding the half fainting form of Homer.

The revulsion of feeling was so great that the strong man reeled, and when he saw and recognized who it was that had been the savior of his boy a film gathered over his eyes. He staggered as he made his way to where the stranger stood, still clasping the careless boy in his arms. Both hands were outstretched to clasp those of the rescuer but the stiff lips refused to articulate the words he would have spoken.

By this time Homer had recovered himself sufficiently to free himself from the firm clasp, and to say,

"All right, old man! No need of being so scared. I have not gone to 'kingdom come'—not just yet."

But not on the boy were the eyes of Mr. Wallace riveted. As if fascinated they hung upon that other young face while his own was working strangely.

"I presume you are the father of this young man?" spoke a clear, full-toned, manly voice.

"Wilbur!" came in husky, broken accents from the pallid lips of Mr. Wallace. "Wilbur, do you not know me?"—in a hesitating, supplicating manner, extending both hands to the young man.

Wilbur started and changed color, retreating a step and bending a searching glance upon the elder man. "You are—my—"

"Father!" interrupted Mr. Wallace." "Yes, I am your father, and the boy whose life you have just saved is your brother."

The boy, Homer, gave vent to a long drawn whistle,—

"Say, Gov'nor! this is news. Where did you manage to have him stowed away all this time?"

The face of Mr. Wallace flushed darkly red.

"Homer, I am ashamed of you. You would please me much by being a little less ill-bred." Then turning again to Wilbur and again extending his hand,

"Will you not permit the past to be forgotten? Must I ask in vain that my boy, my first born, will lay his hand in mine?"

The husky pleading of the voice touched Wilbur. After a few moment's hesitation in which the past seemed to confront him,—in which he seemed to hear the splashing of the icy waters of the Susquehanna river as they closed over the head of the hazel-eyed little mother, so many years ago—a shudder passed through his frame; then his eyes fell upon the boy, almost a young man, but with a sullen look on the otherwise fair face, thereby marring its beauty—the disrespectful manner towards his father, showing an equally marred character. Then his eyes turned to the face of the father who had so long been a stranger to him, and what they saw there again touched his better nature. No! it certainly was not the face of a happy man. There were lines in it that the flight of years alone had not traced. It looked careworn and worried. Slowly, involuntarily his hand was raised and laid in the outstretched palm whose fingers closed about it almost like a vice. Several moments passed ere Mr. Wallace had controlled himself sufficiently to speak, then hurriedly, anxiously.—

"You will go with me? I want you at home."

Wilbur shook his head, but his father only held his hand the faster.

"I will take no refusal. For once I am going to give Edith and Hilda a pleasant surprise. Come, Homer, we will not keep them waiting at home for us any longer." Without answering the boy turned his steps homeward, while Mr. Wallace drew Wilbur's arm through his.

"You will come I know, and the girls will be happy."

Half reluctantly and wholly longingly he permitted himself to be led away and almost ere he knew he found himself standing at the door of the well-known house before which of late he had so often stood.

We have received copies of the program of the Spiritualist Camp-meeting at Clinton, Iowa, to be held August 1st to 29th. Address the secretary, Martin H. McGrath, Fulton, Ill.

Also copies of program of the annual convention of the Kansas Freethought Association to be held at Clay Center, August 6th to 10th. Address the secretary, Laura Knox, Norton, Kan.

VARIOUS VOICES.

John W. Pratt, West Hanover, Mass.:—I enclose fifty cents for my wife, and fifty cents for myself, to enable you to send Lucifer to the addresses of those whom it is desirable to reach. My wife earned the money by picking peas and beans.

L. Roser, Maysville, Ky.:—Enclosed find fifty cents. Please send back numbers of Lucifer from the beginning of "Hilda's Home."

[We have tried to fill all orders like the above, received up to this date. If any have failed to get the numbers they have ordered and paid for we will still fill them as per the old offer. But now that the supply of some of the numbers is running low, the offer at fifty cents is withdrawn, and until further notice the price will be one dollar for the back numbers to 613—the beginning of the story, "Hilda's Home." This is cheaper than the yearly price for Lucifer.]

H. A. Hart, Topolobampo, Mexico:—Enclosed find stamps for which send "Proceedings of the First Kansas Co-operative Congress." I have watched with much interest the controversy growing out of the Putnam-Collins tragedy and am surprised to find that some who have admitted that they believe in the theory of evolution now seem to think that the road has a terminus, that they have traversed the entire line, pulled up at the last station, and assume that all others should have reached there by the same train. The fact is they have been side tracked or ditched and are not conscious of it. A wrecking train may sometime get them on track again when their work will be much more effectual than now. The rightly constituted man or woman needs no external help to enforce compacts of any kind, if not rightly constituted they will almost invariably call for a bayonet, a sheriff or a mob.

Paolo Lusana, Biella, Italy:—Having read and considered very deeply and carefully your paper, as a true defender of reason, light and thought, and consequently fighter against ignorance and superstition, I have the pleasure to say to you I am very satisfied with it, because it is according to my liberal ideas. These good reasons oblige me to subscribe for it. Please to honor me then with an answer, in order that I may know the foreign subscription price for six months and yearly, too, in Italian money.

[As English money is used all over Europe we say to all inquiries like the above that the price of a year's subscription to Lucifer is four English shillings and the postage is one shilling additional, if the paper is mailed every two weeks—two issues in one wrapper, or two shillings additional if mailed every week. International money orders can be bought and sent us at our risk, at the above rates. M. H.]

Geo. Morris Saul, Boston, Mass.:—On June 28th ult. I paid Mr. E. C. Walker one dollar for a year's subscription to Lucifer, but I regret to say that after reading the July number I must ask you to discontinue sending me the paper. I can't endorse its leprous policy, and I don't want its contaminating influence about my office, or my home. If I had known the nature of Lucifer's teachings my subscription would never have been given. I shall not ask you to return the subscription money, but please do not send me any more copies of the paper, or else they will find a place in my waste basket.

[One of the objects of the column, "Various Voices," is to show what the readers think of Lucifer and its teachings. Mr. Saul seems to have made up his mind after reading one number only. If we may judge from the experience of many others whose first impressions were adverse, if Mr. Saul had been patient and fair-minded enough to read the paper for a few months he would have seen that first impressions are not always reliable, and that instead of condemnation he would then have had only words of commendation and approval.]

Ella A. Jennings, M. D., Masonic Temple, Chicago:—The picnic which I attended last Sunday at your request was a most enjoyable outing. It is some twenty-five years since I went to a picnic and the people who composed this one seemed to thoroughly enjoy the coming together of kindred souls. The most note-worthy incidents were: Not the least inharmony among the children—there were about ten or twelve of them. Are freethinkers' children less quarrelsome than other peoples? Another point was the entire absence of unfriendly and unkindly remarks about each other, or in fact about any one or any thing; no criticism whatever. There were old school physicians and reform or new school physicians,—there were Eclectics, Hydropaths, Vegetarians and meat eaters; Socialists, Philosophical Anarchists and Agnostics; Materialists and Spiritualists; Individualists and Collectivists, all in one gathering, each respecting the right of the other, to individual thought and action. We discussed various projects, and while some thought revolution the only hope, others were equally certain that by educational evolution all the wrongs of our present civilization could be righted.

It was a positive treat to me, and I shall always feel grateful that I accepted your hospitable invitation and kindly escort to that memorable picnic. The people practiced their proposed beliefs and perfect liberty was accorded to all—even the children observed law and order as is rarely seen. Our hostess, Dr. Westrup, shed sunshine upon all her guests, and music, anecdote and song enlivened the hours, and before we knew it darkness was upon us. Peace, harmony and good will abounded and could some of the carping critics have been present methinks they would reverse their ungenerous judgment.

May Lucifer picnics come often, and may the genial editor renew life's lease four score and ten upon the original four score or allotted time.

Tom Reece in "The Firebrand":—I had occasion to attend a meeting of the Legitimation League [in London]. The lecture was clever, pungent, ironical, but not connected. There was a splendid contrast between the halting, almost shamefaced, wooing of the present day, and the plain direct avowal of affection of the ancient Egyptian woman who did not scorn to invite her lover to lie with her. He dealt with the evils which had been fastened on sex-union by the law-mongers and moralists; the repression of love under asceticism and its consequent rebound to a state where, in the words of Zola, the "man dines with a brunette and sups with a blonde;" the suppression of spontaneity by calculation; and finally he made out a splendid case for full freedom in love as in all things, concluding with the line of Byron's, "Love is only for the free."

Miss Best, the chairman, made a plea for the ownership of the children by the mother, advocated complete liberty in sexual relationships and on the question of the support of offspring and mothers, believed that all men should support all the mothers and children, and not any individual man support any individual woman. Henry Seymour dealt with the physiology of love and spoke of the absurdity of punishing people for falling in love. He believed in the monogamic ideal but based upon careful, even scientific choice—the two parties should be physically complemental of each other. He thought that the physical requirement of sexual intercourse required study, and that the union of opposite temperaments produced the best offspring. The indebtedness of England to America for her literature of free love was emphasized by the fact that the three books quoted during the meeting were Ruedebusch's "Old and New Ideal," Sadie Fowler's "Road to Freedom," and Moses Harman's "Creed of a Free Lover."

[The correct title of Mr. Harman's pamphlet is "A Free Man's Creed."]

Leroy Berrier, Minneapolis, Minn.:—I am much pleased with Dr. Foote's articles. A thought comes to me on love and its endurance. We hear much of the necessity of physical affinity as the basis of lasting love. This is all right, and there should be psychical affinity also; but I believe the affinities are all right in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred where there is love in the early days of marriage. I do not think the endurance of love depends upon affinities alone. It is the ideal, the soul glories, that gives love endurance. It is the ability of man and woman to see ideal qualities and perfections in each other, that gives endurance and fervor to the "holy flame." The greatest and most lasting love accompanies an exalted character and soul. During the love of early marriage there is an exaltation of character and soul, and each of the lovers sees ideal perfections and qualities in each other. This is the blissful state, and the heart and soul cry out for its continuance, but, alas, in most cases it is fleeting; and why? Simply through ignorance and disobedience of the laws that make possible its continuance. When the most intimate love relations are intelligently regulated, and are the expression of the desire of two loving souls to intermingle, become one, and enter the realm of blissful harmony, their loves not only endure, but strengthen. How few lovers ever learn how to love and experience its bliss. Knowledge is the fountain of the elixir of love and life.

I value Lucifer because it is disseminating this knowledge. I hope the five hundred dollars can be raised. The expenses of a United States court trial and a fine prevent me from subscribing what I should like to give. I am also trying to get out some new revised editions of my pamphlets. The new edition of "Sexuality and its Functions," the pamphlet I was arrested for sending, will sell for fifty cents and it contains as much as the three pamphlets that a certain professor is selling for ten dollars each. If the Lucifer readers will purchase this pamphlet I will subscribe the proceeds to the five hundred dollar fund.

BY REV. SIDNEY HOLMES.

It is now in order for the W. C. T. U. to pass a resolution thanking the Santa Fe railroad officials for issuing an order forbidding its employes from entering liquor saloons when either on or off duty.

Joseph Wilfkowski of Jersey City was fined last week for spanking his wife because she refused to obey him. Is it possible a man has no longer the right in New Jersey to do as he pleases with his own property?

James Max of Chicago, drew a revolver on his wife one day last week. The woman took the weapon from him and beat him over the head with it until he fled from the house yelling for protection. Make your own comments.

The Indiana supreme court decided that the law fixing street carfares at three cents was constitutional. Judge Showalter of the federal court has decided that it is unconstitutional. A corporation with money enough seems to have no trouble in getting a final court decision in its favor.

One of the fiercest antagonists of the Roman Catholic church is Justin L. Fulton, a Baptist clergyman. One of the most grievous offences the Roman church is charged with is the sale of indulgences. And yet the great Baptist University in Chicago was built by the sale of indulgences to Rockefeller.

Governor Tanner was hissed by a crowd of people as he passed the Masonic Temple at the head of his staff in the parade in honor of the unveiling of the John A. Logan monument in Chicago, July 22. But the people of Chicago are not losing their respect for government. They would vote for another governor tomorrow if it was election day.

Meddlesome Comstock has again caused the arrest of Bookseller George H. Richmond in New York City for selling Gabriel D'Annunzio's "The Triumph of Death." Richmond was arrested last April at Comstock's instigation and the state court decided the book was not immoral. Now the federal court is to pass on the question. If the friends of personal liberty had half of Comstock's zeal such outrages would soon cease.

Much indignation is occasionally expressed at the arrest of Salvation Army people on charges of disturbing the peace by holding street meetings. These arrests are outrageous and every lover of personal liberty must condemn the practice. But how many sympathisers with the arrested Salvationists would protest at the arrest of a person who delivered an address in the public streets in opposition to the sexual enslavement of women?

Monopolies created by the government are not always profitable. A firm which had secured the exclusive privilege of selling mail boxes in Chicago from which carriers were to collect letters at private residences, sent out 200,000 circulars to householders offering the boxes for sale and after two months canvass sold only four boxes. Cheaper and better boxes might be purchased exsewhere, but carriers are not permitted to collect from any boxes except those furnished by the firm having the government's sanction.

Variety vs. Monogamy.*

BY E. C. WALKER.

This is an explosive question, and it argues much for the Catholicity and open-mindedness of this society that the subject was selected. And it is a hopeful indication that it is a woman's society which ventures to grapple with the problem—woman being deemed the conservative, the "saving" force, the one power capable of preserving civilization by preventing the acceptance of new ideas, the development of unaccustomed thought.

The discussion of "Variety vs. Monogamy" falls under two general heads.

a. A variety of forms of marriage or sex association versus an enforced, a proscriptive morality.

We have all forms, as a fact, but there is only one recognized, legal, "moral" form. Nearly all men sometimes violate the orthodox code, to the full limit, and nearly all women violate it in some degree short of the full limit, as in thought and in various caresses of look and touch.

The situation thus created is analogous to that in a state where all but one religion are proscribed. Persons believe variously but must ostensibly accept the creed of the state church, or run the risk of punishment. As the attempt to enforce uniformity in religious beliefs makes religious hypocrites, so the attempt to enforce uniformity in sexual relations makes moral hypocrites.

The penalties may be legal, social, or mobocratic. That is, uniformity may be enforced through the physical violence set in operation by the law, through the fear inspired by the societary, political, business and professional boycott, or through the extra-statutory violence of the mob, or through the combined action of two or more of these powers.

But the wide diversity in development caused by geography, climate, race, education, and many other factors of growth render it as impossible to secure a real, a just and healthful uniformity, in the relations of the sexes as it is to secure a like uniformity in religious belief.

We contend, then, first, for variety in systems, so to speak, of sex expression. In other words, we contend for free love, for free love as against any form of state marriage, the recognized form here being monogamy.

* A condensed report of Talks Before the Ladies' Liberal League, of Phila.

So far, then, this is a question of Liberty, primarily.

b. One love versus two or more loves.

The Catholic and some others stand for monogamy both now and hereafter, here and in heaven. Most Protestants admit the morality of remarriage, after the death of one companion, thus practically announcing themselves in favor of monogamy here but of polygamy and polyandry in heaven. And even of a tandem sort of both here, secured through divorce or death, with remarriage.

Most Freethinkers, rejecting the theology, but slavishly accepting the ethics, of the church, denounce contemporaneous polygamy and polyandry but look with favor on the tandem kind just mentioned.

After the attainment of liberty (of free love) the question will be one of variety versus monogamy in individual expression of love. This is a question of experience, (of experiment,) of taste, of health, of method. Profiting, as the wise individual must, by the experience of the past, yet it is his own life that teaches him most. The experience of no other person can be a sure guide for him. Much less can that other person's theories, his generally disregarded theories, furnish him with a safe chart of the ocean of existence. His taste may not be the best, it may be very deficient, but the taste of no other person can take its place and give equal satisfaction. In the matter of physical health, experience can give us better rules than all the moralists and panacea-brewers can lay down. It can never safely be assumed that what is best for one is best for any other man or woman. No one's method of seeking happiness can properly and advantageously be determined by one alien to his thought and feeling.

As to what I think may be under liberty, there probably will always be some individuals who will be monogamic. But, a as rule, it will be a peculiar nature that can be satisfied with or that can attract one only. Still less frequently will the two complements meet. And, finally, perfect complements are practically unthinkable—the more complex the organism the more difficult to find the complement.

In the less differentiated organisms, almost if not any male of a given variety is acceptable to a female of that variety, and vice versa, and one at a time or during life satisfies all requirements. Increasing complexity renders this mating more and more difficult. Points of possible divergence are multiplied until it may take many individuals of the opposite sex to fully complement the finely organized woman or man. The conclusion, therefore, must be that monogamy represents a comparatively undeveloped physical, emotional, intellectual and social state.

To the probable objection that history shows that monogamy is surely supplanting polygamy and polyandry, and that a fair inference is that it will also drive out free variety, it is to be replied that economic development, under certain climatic and geographical conditions, is chiefly responsible for the change so far made, that the same influence is undermining monogamy in its turn, and that the legal dominance of monogamy has in no wise lessened the sum-total of non-monogamic relations.

The seemingly irresistible tendency is toward individuation. Unless a reactionary cataclysm sweeps us backward into barbarism, the individual is to be the social and sexual unit, as he is now, in theory, at least, the religious and political unit. Slavery in its many forms, the patriarchal family, the clan, the tribe, the monogamic family, denied and deny the common denominator, the individual. All these subordinated many or one to a few or to another one. Their units were always complex or fractional, or, rather, the social and political unit was a compound of fractions of individuals.

The extinction of superstitious moralism, and the complete economic independence of woman, sends monogamy into the same limbo with polygamy and other forms of female dependence and therefore of female subserviency and degradation.

So much by way of explanation of the asserted and superficially apparent tendency toward sexual monogamy. Now to repeat, in substance. No rule is applicable to all or to any considerable number, or to the same individuals for life or even for many years. I will now give some of the main divisions and sub-divisions of varietists.

Some are practical monogamists and theoretical varietists. Unfavorable environments and timidity of disposition are chiefly responsible for this contradiction between thought and life. Others are theoretical monogomists and practical varietists. These constitute the great army of the hypocritical Philistines.

Next we find contemporaneous varietists and consecutive varietists. Some alternate swiftly between variety and monogamy. Others are varietists in young manhood and womanhood and monogamists in later life. Feeling usually dominates in both periods, and cooling passions and lessened vigor are mistaken for increasing virtue and augmenting wisdom. From this class come many of the most imbecile and malignant recruits to the army of persecution. In sharp contrast with the sub-division last named, is that composed of those who were monogamists in the romance period of youth and varietists in the years of accumulated knowledge. In spite of all stumblings, these keep their eyes fixed on an ideal, but the ideal is transformed under the chiseling hand of experience.

Once more, we find some who are varietists in health and monogamists when ill, seemingly learning nothing from their own past. Next we have varietists loving two or more with an approximately equal affection. Then comes the varietist who loves one very much and others with far less intensity and persistence. Another has a central love with subsidiary loves at one time with approximately equal loves at another.

Some varietists change lovers with moderate frequency, and still others perhaps not at all. There are varietists who ever remain the friends of their old lovers, while other varietists always or generally lose all interest in their lovers, after a time. Again, there are varietists who retain some old lovers as friends and comrades while forgetting others.

In short, there are as many kinds of varietists as there are classes of individuals.

Monogamy means possession, and possession means slavery, either of law, social restraint, or of habit. We are not happy when we are jealous and we are sure to be jealous if we believe in exclusive possession and love an object worth appropriating. Honestly accepting freedom of the affections, and variety, we realize that attraction is not within the control of the will, and that we can hold all that is ours and no more. So we shall cease to rave and murder. No matter what we may desire, equilibration means the cessation, for the time, and perhaps forever, of the attraction, and we must turn elsewhere or starve. Fretting will not help us, killing will not help us, despair is foolish.

Variety is the moderator, the assuager, the comforter. Whether our paths diverge while life remains to both or whether the scythe of death sweeps between us, the blade of grief is dulled and peace and joy come again to us in the handclasp and on the lips of lovers, old or new, one or many.

From Morality to Savoir Faire.

Programme for a new chapter in White's "Conflict of Science with Theology."

BY C. L. JAMES.

It is impossible to overrate the importance of that revolution in philosophy generally which was effected by Francis Bacon. That truth is, as assumed by other philosophers, the end of inquiry; but that the only evidence of having found truth is ability to do something; that this ability is acquired solely by observation and experiment; that observation and experiment, not speculation and controversy, are, accordingly the real business of truth seekers; these are those radically new ideas, which, in physics, chemistry, biology, "sociology," nay, even in mathematics and religion, have displaced, or are displacing, dogma, declamation, persecution, and other familiar methods of theology by those of science.

Except theologians, no class of thinkers have welcomed the innovation so coldly as their nearest congeners, the moralists. Bacon advised them to discard such insoluble problems as the grounds of moral obligation and the freedom of the human will, —to attempt discovering what are "the actual effects produced by particular modes of education, by the indulgence of particular habits, by the study of particular books, by society, by emulation, by imitation."* To a limited extent teachers, alienists and penologists, have followed this excellent advice. But professed writers on ethics have usually preferred to tread over again the old straw left by Zeno, Plato, Aristotle, Pyrrho and Epicurus. The Egoist and Altruist, like the Epicurean and Stoic before them, continue to repeat their hostile war cries, Virtue and Pleasure, with the old result, that one adds as little to the amount of pleasure as the other to that of virtue. The great progress made since Bacon's time, of which I shall now attempt a summary, has been made for the most part indirectly, by hygienists investigating the laws of health or economists there of riches; but it has been made altogether through the Baconian method above described.

A maxim in high favor with moralists has been that labor is wholesome to mind and body—a very useful maxim it was too, for those who wanted someone else to do the labor! But sanitary science has totally refuted it. Vital statistics show beyond all possibility of doubt that the amount of sickness among every class of laborers is in strict proportion to the amount of their exertion (with one reservation presently to be mentioned); that the death rate, though not quite so strictly conditioned by labor, comes very near it; that the rich, in spite of their luxury, are the longest-lived class, and beggars, in spite of their misery, the next, because they do not work; that labor is more injurious to the body than anything else—out of comparison more so than gluttony, semi-starvation, or the forced idleness of prisoners, who are also a long-lived class. As for the effect of labor on the mind, it is equally clear that bodily labor makes men dull and stupid. Mental labor is doubtless better for the mind than idleness. Statistics do not show that it is for the body. They do show that it is much less injurious to the body than muscle work—for the obvious reason that, though fully as foreign to many people's instincts, it requires far less expenditure of physical force. But educational science also teaches that there is a medium between idleness and labor, in which body and mind both are at their best. "The play-instinct is the creative instinct." The blowing off of that surplus force accumulated in every healthy organism is not to be called work; but it is the most useful—the only original—exercise of power. It follows that labor is, as was always thought before there were moralists, a primitive curse, and not a primitive blessing. The end of work is to gain time for play by getting rid of work. That "fool's paradise" in which all necessary conservative labor is to be thrown upon machinery, will not be a paradise for fools but the true Elysium of mind.

An out-door life was always recommended—for the edification of peasants, soldiers, sailors, and other slaves of plutocracy,—till vital statistics began being taken. That one exception they show to our rule of labor's being the chief cause for sickness and death is that exposure to the elements counts for pretty near as much as mere strenuousness of work. It is true, life averages longer in the country than in cities. But analysis of occupations shows that this cannot depend on outdoor pursuits. It depends on the poisoning of city air and water. Accordingly the comparison is much less striking than when sanitation was less heeded. The death rate in London is now lower per thousand than it once was through England, taking town and country together. As for the boasted innocence of rural life, police statistics show that there is more crime proportionally to population detected in rural districts than cities, though the vigilance of the authorities is far less. A city with railroads, and other facilities, which mix rus in urbe with urbs in rure—"a cityless and countryless world,"—is the ideal of the future.

It is evident this ideal is inconsistent with the raving craving for a home and a fireside which makes such a tedious cadence in Colonel Ingersoll's lectures. The good wife who carded wool, spun, wove, cooked and brewed; the atrium, the "black room," the one smoke-blackened room of an Italian hut, which contained the Lares and Penates, the fire of Hestia, and the lectum genialis, was no doubt a pleasant ideal—in the days of Virgil's Georgics. But it is gone, never to return. It is going further every day. The new woman, who reads, writes, speaks, votes, follows a profession, lives in a boarding house, lives where she will, and owns her offspring, is a product of railroads, factories, telephones, ocean cables, and other such Baconianisms, who may decline if they do, but must increase if they increase.

And now comes Malthus to show us that legal chastity, early marriage, large families, mean slavery, mean inequality of ranks, mean grinding poverty, mean famine, mean war, mean infant mortality, mean everything opposed to all we are seeking, and what is more, are getting.

Moralists have poured unbounded abuse upon illicit trades —theft, gambling, liquor selling, prostitution—without diminishing them an iota. Economic science shows that they follow exactly the same economic laws as other trades. They are not diseases but blossoms on the tree of law-protected capitalism; and must grow as long as it does. And so of other wicked trades, as war. Parsimony is a virtue which intuitional and egoistic moralists have usually agreed to recommend—the former from prejudice against "luxury," the latter—never mind. But it does not require much reflection to see that hoarding money can benefit the individual only at expense of the world—that exchange causes production, and production wealth—that a penny saved is absolutely two pence wasted.

Charity was a virtue loudly praised till lately. Since Malthus and Darwin showed it to be "fostering feebles" against that law of natural selection which causes progress by eliminating them, a very decided reaction has occurred. It is now quite seriously proposed to assist nature by sterilizing "feebles." But, behold! degeneration philosophy appears, to teach that feebles have their uses. All geniuses are degenerate. To sterilize a possible parent of genius is to run a great risk of doing harm. The inference is obvious. We can recommend no one to "foster feebles," except as his own benevolence constitutes a call upon him to do so at his own cost. But neither can we venture, like Lycurgus, on suppressing them. They must take their chance with the benevolence and other conditions.

The propositions of this article are original in no other way than by being plainly stated, and put all together. Their data may be found in any encyclopædia. But on comparing them with the current dogmas of morality, I think it must be admitted that they make a pretty clean sweep. That absolute individualism indicated by the last one, sums up the essence of them all. Morality in every school and form amounts to forbidding people to do as they please. The fundamental maxim of that savoir faire into which we are passing from morality is, "Do as you please:—and hang me if I make any one get you out of the consequences."

The object of this fund is to send sample copies and trial subscriptions to those who have not yet been made acquainted with Lucifer's educational work in sexologic science.

A Reminder.

Knowing that hundreds of our subscribers are out of employment, and that all feel the pressure of our iniquitous money system—a system that rewards the parasites and robbers who live by the labor of others and punishes those who ask only an equal opportunity to labor and to reap the reward of their labor; knowing the general distress that has followed the adoption of "monometalism" and the granting of special privileges to the favored few, by our lords and masters at Washington and in Wall street and Lombard street, knowing all this, we whose business it is to look after the finances of Lucifer have said but little about arrearages, or the money due to the paper on subscription. Believing that all who have given us their names as subscribers and who continue to take the paper from the post office intend to pay for it when conditions will permit them to do so, we continue sending until ordered to discontinue.

From the ordinary business standpoint, this will be considered very unwise policy, and if Lucifer were published to make money for its publishers then nothing but disaster could be expected to follow such financial management. But money-getting is not Lucifer's mission, but rather the overthrow of the superstitions upon which our money-getting system is built. This being our object we send the paper to all who approve its aims and who are doing what they can, in any and all ways to eliminate the systems that make possible the slaveries, the despotisms, the miseries, the crimes and vices that confront us on every hand.

In order, however, that we may know that Lucifer is read and appreciated, and that those to whom it is sent are doing all they can to help forward its educational work, it is necessary that we hear from those who have fallen behind on subscription. Once more, then, we ask that all those whose time has expired will write us to say whether they wish the paper continued to their address. And when writing to ask a continuance if a remittance can also be sent—if only a few postage stamps, it will be perhaps the best possible evidence to us that the paper is being read and appreciated. We are willing as ever to work on without wages, without pecuniary reward as such, but to do this it is necessary to know that those to whom we send the paper that costs us our time, our labor and our money—or the money of our helpers, appreciate the efforts we are making for the common benefit.

Once more, then, to save time, labor and postage stamps in sending out statements of account, we adopt this method of reminding those whose subscriptions have expired that a remittance from them will be thankfully received, or, if that is not possible, then a few lines to say whether or not the continued visits of Lucifer are desired by the person so notified.

Marriage as a Study in Sociology.

That the marriage institution is one of the most important of all the factors that enter into the social problem will perhaps be admitted by all who have given the subject even a passing or superficial examination. The early history of marriage among all tribes and peoples, shows that women and their labor were considered of great value as merchantable commodities. Whether such was the case under the matriarchate it may be difficult now to determine, but ever since masculine man, by the aid of priestly authority and cunning, came to be considered the head of the family woman's person as breeder of children and her service as household drudge, and as all-around menial, have been considered proper objects of barter and sale.

Thus in the legendary history of the Hebrews—that wonderful Semitic or Arab tribe whose descendants are today the money kings of the earth—the acquisitive propensity is shown by Laban when he compelled his nephew Jacob to serve seven years as pay for his cousin Rachel, and then tricked the long-waiting bridegroom by substituting the ill-favored Leah. And Saul sold his daughter Michal to David, not for the usual dowry of cattle, sheep or asses, but for two hundred "foreskins" of the Philistines. (For definition of this unusual commodity, see Webster's dictionary.)

But the acquisitive Hebrews were not by any means singular in thus making merchandise of their marriageable daughters. Read "Woman, Church and State," or any Encyclopedia on marriage customs of all nations and we find the same low estimate placed upon woman—catalogued with the husband's chattels, "his house, his ox, his ass, etc."

Among the thoughtful and earnest seekers for the root causes of the present unhappy, iniquitous and crime producing conditions with which we are all environed is Joshua K. Ingalls, author of "Social Wealth," "Economic Equities," "Land and Labor," "Work and Wealth," "The Unrevealed Religion," etc. In his latest work, "Reminiscences of an Octogenarian," Mr. Ingalls thus speaks of the origin of institutional marriage:

"The existence of sex and the mutual attraction observed in its manifestations constitute the paramount interest of human life. And it is for this reason that the ecclesiastic and the civil ruler in attempting to guard it against the abuses and misdirections of ignorance, have seized upon it as a sure means of perpetuating and extending their authority and power. They have invested marriage with forms of law and sacrament of religion, which so far from proving a guide and safe-guard to the weaker and unwary, has resulted—through suppression of the natural impulses which they have decreed to be vile and unclean, and the denial of opportunity for scientific investigation, in the vilest and most filthy abuses of the sex nature, and which the severest penal laws and sanctimonious denunciations, have not only failed utterly to remove, but have incalculably increased and perpetuated them far beyond what would have proved their normal limitation. Their pretentious legal sanctification of the passion, has not elevated but degraded it."

After speaking at some length upon the subjection of woman in marriage and the deplorable consequences of such enslavement, Mr. Ingalls adds:

"With the passing away of legal polygamy the treatment of woman became less oppressive; but virtual polygamy still exists among the most monogamic people. According to statements made by the purists, the houses of ill fame are patronized largely by married men in all countries prescribing monogamy. And of the married Christian statesmen who voted to kill polygamy in Utah, many were known as patrons of the 'pleasure houses' of Washington or keepers of mistresses. So far as the Alpha and Social Purity movements are concerned, not only must the man and the woman be held to the same standard, but also the married and the unmarried, in all matters of sex relation, unless exception be made in the rare instances where offspring are mutually desired. This may not be acknowledged by the parties, but is the stern logic of their position. The effect should these views prevail upon the legal marriage is not readily conjectured. But upon voluntary and mutual love marriage its application is apparent. If mutual love is essential to marriage, when it ceases marriage ceases.

NO NEED OF LAW.

"That the monogamic marriage for life is the highest ideal of marriage is I think generally conceded, although the need of a law to make it more so appears an admission to the contrary. We do not need a law to make water run down hill, or the sun to rise at a particular hour. And we do not make a punishable offense of attempts to ascertain the truth in these respects. But we can never know whether the monogamic life union is the highest and best form of marriage until the despotic hand of the state and the dogmatic dicta of the church shall be withdrawn from the trial balance, and the interested parties left free to determine it for themselves. The pure monogamic marriage has never been generally observed in any Christian country. The question then is not what form shall be arbitrarily established, but simply will freedom or despotism secure the greatest number of life long, happy monogamic unions? Through conventional legalities, the failure is all too patent. Freedom will succeed better. To doubt this is to abandon the pretension, and deny the monogamic claim altogether. All those who would separate but for the law, are already divorced as to any true marriage.

FREEDOM OF INVESTIGATION.

"In reviewing the several forces which have already appeared in this controversy, I wish merely to forecast the trend which the reform seems likely to take. Had my voice weight I would plead for freedom of investigation, and well ordered experimentation, under scientific conditions and tests, not only of this but of all subjects involving human well-being. As a matter of opinion I think that the lovemaking which becomes intelligent and in accord with the golden rule of 'equal regard for others as for ourselves,' marriage would not often prove the grave of love, but continue sweet, helpful and healthful to the end of life and the sex force cease to be either crucified or recklessly squandered in the early years, leaving life thereafter a blank and desolate barren to man and to woman, who desires the caresses of love long after the ability to bear children has lapsed. It is the gentle bearing and fondling of the lover which wins and holds the affection of the true woman. It is only when the discovery is made that the husband cannot rise above what is low and animal in his love nature that there comes disappointment repulsion and disgust. When her love and intelligence is unable to lift and hold him to her level, submission becomes so humiliating and depressing that life is made a burden. But the tables are turned sometimes and the woman becomes the aggressive force. Unless the man can now lift her from the pool of sensuality this works a degeneracy as unfortunate as the other. She is not so constituted as to make physical force available, but by masterful will or hypnotic suggestion, she can work his ruin physically and mentally. There have been Antoninas in every age.

WOMAN MUST LEAD.

"It is a hopeful circumstance that the movements to which I have referred are chiefly under the direction of women. In the differentiation of refined intercourse and mating for life from the mere animal function of reproduction, woman must necessarily take the lead and by her higher spirituality and truer social instinct save her brother and herself from the falses and misdirections, ignorance and long established habits have imposed upon their affection for each other."

The whole chapter from which these extracts are taken is well worth perusal by all who are seeking a way out from the social and economic wilderness, and a safe passage to the promised land of Justice, Equity, Truth and Righteousness. The entire volume comprises the ripened reflections of a well known writer, lecturer and humanitarian reformer. "Reminiscences of an Octogenarian" is a book of two hundred pages, stiff linen cover, with portrait of the author, price forty cents. It can be ordered from this office.

How the Happiness of the Sinful Grieves the "Good."

George E. Macdonald, in "The Truth Seeker."

An alien magazine called the "Adult" has reached me. It is printed by the Legitimation League of London, and is "a journal for the advancement of freedom in sexual relationships." In America the members of the Legitimation League would not be sought after to adorn an ethical basis. Leaving monogamy out of the discussion, the contributors to the "Adult" have the least prejudice toward the different forms of connubial life of any writers I have ever read after. They are prepared to hear arguments in favor of polygamy, polyandry, or variety, and will make such arguments the subject of deep, pregnant thought. The central purpose of the Legitimatists is to break up the marriage trust, which is condemned as a conspiracy of church and state in restraint of commerce, refusing as it does the blue label of the marriage union to the products of industry carried on outside the combination. As viewed by the "Adult," marriage for life enslaves the future to an emotion of the present, and sacrifices actual happiness to an ideal rarely attained. There are many people who despise the doctrines of the men and women called Legitimatists in England and Social Radicals in America. I heard the other day of a woman who took up with a married man, expecting that his wife would get a divorce. The wife said she didn't care, declined to appeal to the law, and went to work to support herself and children. The other one said a woman who would act that way must be a Freelover, and cut her cold, refusing to allow her children to associate with those of the wife who was left, for fear they would get lax notions of morality. The people who despise the social independents do so not so much because such independence hurts anybody else as because it does not appear to hurt those who assert it. A man may ignore custom and get plenty of sympathy when he suffers and repents, but he will never be forgiven if he demonstrates that following the beaten path is not necessary to his enjoyment of life or his usefulness as a citizen. I think I speak for many good people when I say that the happiness and prosperity of the sinful grieves me more than all the misery of the virtuous.

A Critic Criticised.

BY W. N. SLOCUM.

I am surprised at some of the criticisms made by E. C. Walker in No. 666. This, for instance:

"Inasmuch as man is part of nature it inevitably follows that if Mr. Kerr was in error, as Mr. Slocum asserts he was, then nature does make mistakes."

Mr. Walker must have known that by nature I meant the order of the universe, not the acts of individuals. He shows that he knew this in his next sentence:

"It can only rationally be said that nature makes no mistakes when it is taken for granted that nature has no intentions, no plans, no schemes."

Exactly, and it is because I recognize this fact that I wrote, "nature makes no mistakes." I did not assert that Mr. Kerr was in error. On the contrary, I confirmed his statements, and merely suggested an additional consideration. Mr. Walker should be more careful in his assertions, lest he be the one "in error." He says:

"Looked at from the view-point of man, of his needs, his happiness, nature teems with mistakes."

Not so, Mr. Walker. Pain is no mistake. It is by pain that man is warned that something is wrong, and that he must apply a remedy. Mental suffering is no mistake—it not only had a cause which some one is responsible for, but it produces an effect, the law of nature being that through suffering comes refinement; through experience we gain knowledge. There is no mistake here.

A friend writes to me: "If I find two truths in my possession which seem to conflict I set it down that I have not received all of these truths, or that there is another truth, not yet received by me, which would reconcile them."

Usually Mr. Walker is a seeker after truth, but in this instance he seems to be a seeker for flaws, and I admit he finds a flaw in an inexact phrase used by me, viz.: "There will always be sustenance sufficient on earth for all the children of earth." The last word should be men instead of "earth," as I intended to include only the human family. The sacrifice of life among the lower orders is in accordance with the law of nature—one animal subsisting upon another—and this continues in lesser degree among men; but this fact does not contradict the other fact that as man becomes spiritualized his progeny decreases; nor does it militate against that other fact, that until then the supply of sustenance will be sufficient to meet the demand, and I may add this will be fully met, even without the use of animal food.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER XXXXIX.

Edith gave a gasp when she saw the stalwart figure of her brother enter the door at her father's side; but she welcomed him by laying her white round arm about his neck and kissing him. Hilda stood for a moment looking from one to another in a bewildered manner, then a bright light almost transfigured her face. Gliding to her father's side she surprised that individual by winding her arms about his neck and pressing her fresh dewy lips to his. Then laying her cheek to his whispered:

"I thank you from the bottom of my heart."

What was it that arose in his throat and dimmed his eye? When had a sweet woman's kiss been pressed upon his lips before. He laid a trembling hand upon the back of a chair to steady himself while his eye followed the hazel-eyed girl—so like the Erna of long ago. For just one moment it had seemed to him that it had been she who whispered that "Thank you." That it had been her cheek resting against his. A sigh escaped his lips as he thought of how short duration had been their happiness. Why had it been so short? Even now he could not understand, but he felt a glow of satisfaction, such as he had not known in many a long year, as he watched the group of three. For the first time a feeling of conscious pride swelled in his heart at the thought that they were his children. Mrs. Wallace, when she entered the room in her sweeping robes was not exactly delighted when the guest of the evening was introduced to her, but had enough of good grace to tender him a kindly welcome when she heard of the service he had rendered her own son. Besides this splendid young giant commanded her respect, whether she would or not. She always did admire handsome men, and Wilbur was decidedly handsome. So once more—what he never believed would ever again be possible—Wilbur found himself sitting at his father's table, partaking of his bread, of his hospitality, and felt conscious that he was doing right; knew that his idolized sisters sanctioned it. Both were extremely happy and, conscious of that happiness Wilbur felt as though inspired, and talked as he had never before talked. His sisters were proud of him and his father was surprised and astounded at the store of knowledge he possessed, at the ideas that had possession of his active brain, and a new light dawned upon his mind.

It was, he now began to see, this brother who had been the teacher of the sisters, developing them into the splendid independent women that they were. Even Mrs. Wallace became interested, although most of that which he said was as so much Greek to her. It was of so foreign a nature to her. She found more to disagree with than agree to, yet she found herself listening to every word. Stranger than all, Homer was aroused; his senses were alert. Where had he ever heard such doctrines propounded before? Certainly not in such a strain. Yet he had heard them, and with his mates of the boarding school had jeered and laughed and scoffed at what they termed "would-be-reformers." Now he began to see how much superior were these thoughts when compared with the useless studies with which his head had been crammed, and with the teachings of the dime novels which he and his mates had devoured—inflaming their passions and leading to the formation of vile habits.

While Wilbur was speaking he had been watching the flushing and paling face of the boy. A suspicion of what made him languid and nervous and sullen forced itself upon his mind and he forthwith made up his mind to take the lad in hand. He also observed that none of the other children were possessed of a healthy color, but with this one he was, for the moment, most interested. He remained all the afternoon, partaking again of the evening meal, thereby causing him to draw still nearer to the slumbering heart and senses of Homer; at the same time winning his way into the hearts of all the others. So when after supper as usual a double seated cutter drawn by a span of fiery horses came dashing to the door, Wilbur surprised that young gentleman by inviting him to join them

"It will do him good," glancing at his father.

Thus Homer made the acquaintance of this circle which was to influence all his afterlife. As soon as opportunity offered Wilbur drew young Arthurs aside and had a prolonged conversation with him, their eyes frequently resting on the pale face of the boy. Presently Mrs. Leland was also drawn into the conversation and when it ended all understood what was expected of them.

Mrs. Leland drew near the boy who was a stranger in their midst, and in a pleasant motherly fashion began to talk to him, gradually drawing him out, finding much intelligence stored away in the youthful mind but which had all been going to waste for the want of a guiding hand and skillful touch to turn it into proper channels. Edith and Hilda watched while a feeling of joy filled their hearts. Was there really something more than self-will, indolence and haughty overbearing in the nature of the boy, hidden beneath that repellant exterior? Presently it was Imelda's turn to exert her gentle influence on him in her bright, animated manner, and when Cora's voice filled the large room with a burst of song he felt as if lost in a new world. The two sisters knew he was taken care of, and in their turn devoted themselves to the invalid. Poor Frank! They had the satisfaction of seeing his face light up and the color come and go in the wan cheeks. He had learned to love this circle which nightly met here, where naught but love seemed to reign, while Mrs. Leland was almost worshipped by him. Was ever mother so kind to erring boy before? If his own mother—but here he stopped. She too had been erring, suffering. She belonged to his wasted past. She had been an over-indulgent mother to him, in spite of her fretfulness and peevishness, and at this late day he felt that it would be wrong for him to throw a stone upon her grave. While Hilda toyed with his white hand Edith was standing at the back of his chair, smoothing back the clustering locks from his brow. A sense of peace and quiet came over him, such as he had not known in the olden days. Now and then a much meaning look passed between the young physician and the elder sister, calling forth a warmer hue to the fair cheek. Hilda enjoyed the same kind of by play with Lawrence, to whom it seemed impossible to gain more than a few moments at a time at her side, while Mrs. Leland was more successful with her boy lover. When the goodnights had been spoken and our party was whirling homeward, Homer was very quiet. He was deeply impressed with all he had seen and heard, and his thoughts were busy.

Next morning, earlier far than had been Homer's habit to rise, two strong, young figures appeared at the door asking admittance, and sending the merry tinkle of the bell through the rooms. Wilbur and Osmond, ready for a hunting trip, had come to take Homer with them. The boy was tired from being out so late the evening before, and at first was not at all inclined to join them. It seemed he could not muster enough of will force to face the crisp morning air, while Mrs. Wallace objected with all her strength, being positively sure that her darling would take cold because he was not at all strong. But Wilbur carried his point. A half hour later, warmly clad and well equipped for their day of sport they set out, being soon joined by Dr. Arthurs, Norman and Westcot they formed quite a party of hunters. As they started away from the Westcot home a pair of dark eyes, watching them from the window of the invalid, grew dim and a pair of lips quivered in helpless longing. But fair woman's hands took him in tow and made it so pleasant and entertaining that he forgot the manly sports the others were following.

The hunters were out long hours. Up hills and down valleys, through woods and meadows, across rocks and frozen brooks they went. Warming to the excitement of the sport, sending the blood bounding through his veins Homer forget he was weak and tired. The reaction set in, however, and when they returned he slept long hours, but when the evening came he was ready and anxious to go to the home of the Westcots.

Next morning another excursion had been planned and again they carried Homer with them. This time they managed to take Elmer also, in spite of the protests of the anxious mother who saw certain death in store for her pampered darlings—tramping about these rough mornings through the snow; and when she saw them return so tired they almost fell asleep on their feet she felt more anxious than ever. Soon, however, a change made itself manifest. They were less fretful and discontented. Their eyes were brighter and a more healthy color tinged their cheeks, while they ate with an apparent appetite.

Paul Arthurs now frequently called at the house. He also prescribed a new course for the younger children. He forbade sweetmeats, spices and condiments. A simple diet of bread, milk and grain foods, fruit and nuts, he told the mother, was far more wholesome than the meats and highly seasoned food they had hitherto been accustomed to.

"Give them a daily bath, then rub them until a warm glow shows itself; then plenty of outdoor exercise. The cold will not hurt them but rather benefit them. Let them go coasting, skating and snowballing until they are tired out; so tired that they scarce can keep on their feet, and my word for it, Madame, if you follow this course you will soon have the satisfaction of seeing the glow of health in the faces of your children. They need no medicine. They are suffering from a nervous debility that only wholesale exercise in the open air and healthy simple food will correct. I look to you," turning to Edith, "to see that these directions are carried out; you understand I am sure?"

Edith as well as Hilda did understand. The young doctor as well as the girls did not dare to tell Mrs. Wallace the true reason of the delicate state of health of all her children—that the seeds thereof had been sown in the abominable boarding schools she would have considered highly improbable. At however slight intimation of the real cause she would have been liable, in her passion, to turn them all from the house and thus her children would have been robbed of the only chance of regaining their health. So they wisely kept the secret they had penetrated and insisted on a course of treatment that these pampered darlings thought extremely cruel. But soon the effect was apparent, and there was hope that the morbid cravings might be destroyed, and a strong and pure man and womanhood be secured to them in the future.

So it was that a new life entered this house, and in a manner scarcely noticeable. A better footing was established between the stepmother and the daughters. There was more peace and quiet. Once in a while the order was reversed and the circle would gather in the Wallace home, but not often. There were many reasons why it should not be the same. The visitors were made welcome, it is true, but the entertainers must at all times be guarded in their speech. They could not be quite themselves; and then Frank never gathered enough strength to bear the fatigue of the drive back and forth in the cold night air. One or the other would remain at home with him, as in spite of his protests his sisters and friends would not consent to leaving him alone.

Mr. Wallace had tried hard to induce Wilbur to take up his abode in his house during his stay in the city, but in this the son was obdurate. He had buried and consigned to oblivion much of the past, for the sake of his sisters and also for the sake of those other children who were also his brothers and sisters, and whom he would, as it were, snatch from an early grave, but he could not bring himself to lay his head on the pillow beneath the roof that should have been a loving shelter to his own precious mother; in the home of the man who should have loved and cherished instead of driving her with his criminal neglect to a watery grave. When such thoughts came to him it was all he could do to curb the ill-will that would fill his heart, and only by the force of his strong will did he succeed in banishing a feeling of hatred.

Meanwhile this son became more dear to the father, day by day, and his heart went out to the children of his first marriage as it had never done to the younger ones.

M. Rowe, Redmon, Ill.:—Enclosed find express money order for five dollars "To Extend Lucifer's Work." I am always glad to do what I can for Lucifer, for you are doing, and have been doing just what I would do if I had the ability. We seem to be in a hopeless minority at present, but will trust to the work of coming years.

W. W. Ludlow, Cleveland, Ohio:—I think you treat Mr. Green very well indeed. You can afford to do this, for he misses the point by at least a thousand miles. As Holmes says, "Every real thought on every real subject knocks the wind out of somebody or other and as soon as the breath comes back he very probably begins to expend it in hard words."

M. C. Shay, Mayflower, Fla.:—In Lucifer, June 23, I read of a colony on a large scale. I have been looking for a colony for a long time or for something that would benefit working people. I have thought of a plan to put my land in with this big colony to build a home for tourists—have it ready for winter visitors and let it be known the proceeds are for the cause. This is a rough sketch. I am not clever but would like to do something to better this disgraceful, this truly barbarous system.

Andrew Shearer, Frankfort, Kan:—I fear I have neglected you. I must be a year behind with my subscription to Lucifer. I am not taking so much interest in your work as formerly

Do these figures correspond with the number printed on the wrapper of your Lucifer? If so your subscription expires with this number. Please renew for another year.

You have converted me long ago, but I must admit that it was against the grain when you commenced your work on me some twelve or fourteen years ago. My family is growing, up and I will continue Lucifer if thereby my boys may catch the inspiration also. My wife still reads Lucifer with interest. I am studying the Psychical, and might be called a "Mental Scientist." I think by that means to remain well and happy, and possibly to extend life's limit. I recommend it to your careful consideration. The spiritual is the real. Find enclosed two dollars to apply on Lucifer.

J. B. Elliott, 3515 Wallace St., Phil.:—The enclosed stamps were given to me by Mr. Chas. J. Westrich for a trial subscription for Lucifer. I wish I could remit some at the same time. McKinley's adversity has got me yet. E. C. Walker did some good missionary work while here.

The only thing I can do is to renew my offer to send "Looking Backward" at twenty-five cents to those who are readers of Lucifer and who think nationalism a solution or a means to an end. I have only a few copies left. Also one copy of "The Woman Who Dares," by Mrs. Gesterfeld. Slightly used, but good for investigators in sex problems. Price, one dollar. It is now out of print. Give my kindest regards to Lillian and all Lucifer's staff, and if any of the friends of the cause should stray this way I should be pleased to show them the courtesy due to moral reformers and try to make them feel at home. Much pleased with Dr. Foote's articles.

Ozymandias.

I met a traveler from an antique land
Who said: Two vast and trunkless legs of stone
Stand in the desert. Near them, on the sand,
Half sunk, a shattered visage lies, whose frown,
And wrinkled lip, and sneer of cold command,
Tell that its sculptor well those passions read
Which yet survive, stamped on those lifeless things,
The hand that mocked them and the heart that fed:
And on the pedestal these words appear:
"My name is Ozymandias, king of kings:
Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair!"
Nothing beside remains. Round the decay
Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare
The lone and level sands stretch far away.

The Strike of the Strassburg Geese.

BY CYRUS W. COOLRIDGE.

The readers of Lucifer undoubtedly remember the sad story of the Strassburg geese, as related by Mr. R. B. Kerr, and if the heading of this article happens to attract their attention, they will surely exclaim: "What! The Strassburg geese on a strike? Impossible! We have seen them not long since, and the majority of them seemed to be perfectly satisfied with their lot. They said that to be made into pate de foie gras is the greatest privilege and blessing a goose can think of, and that they were very grateful to men for feeding them so nicely and thus relieving them from the necessity of hunting for food. How, then, can they be on a strike now?"

Well, "there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in your philosophy." It may seem strange, but it is a fact that the Strassburg geese are on a strike. Such, at least, is the news which I learn from the "Goosedom Illustrated Weekly."

"But what is the object of their strike?" the reader will ask. "What do they want?"

Well, they demand a very strange thing, in fact, a very unreasonable thing, and how they can be so impudent as to demand it is above my understanding. They want—what do you think?—to be their own masters; they do not want to recognize men as their owners.

"This is, indeed, a very strange and silly thing," the reader will say. "Do they refuse to be made into pate de foie gras?"

No, nothing of the kind; they simply demand that henceforth they should have the right to choose the men who shall make pates of them. They say: "To be made into pate de foie gras is well enough, but why should we not have a voice in the matter? What right have you, men, to catch us and make pates of us without asking our permission? If we are to give our livers to men, we claim the right to give them to those whom we like best and at the time when it suits us best. Away with your brutality and tyranny! We shall no longer be slaves to you."

I beg the reader not to hold me responsible for these words which, it must be admitted, are of an offensive nature. I have copied the above utterance from the "Goosedom Illustrated Weekly," and as a historian I must give you the truth, regardless of what it may be. Of course, as a man I am not going to defend the geese and to admit the justness of their demand. No! geese are ordained by the gods to be the property of men, and to assert the contrary is to disobey the will of the gods and to destroy the order of the universe. The geese are wrong; they have no right to tell us men what we ought or ought not to do with them. But they are rebels and we must recognize the fact, whether we like it or not.

Some of the geese, it is sad to relate, not only do not want to call men their masters, but insist that they must have the liberty to give their livers to as many men as they wish, if they are inclined to do so. "The freedom to choose one man," they say, "is not sufficient. Many a goose likes more than one man. Why, then, should she keep her liver for one man only? If a goose wishes to provide pate de foie gras for several men of her choice, why should she not have the right to do so?"

Are you shocked, reader? Well, so am I. Such a demand is, indeed, revolting and outrageous; but fortunately not many geese approve of it. Bad as the geese are, the majority of them denounce the demand for absolute freedom as contrary to the laws of God and of nature, the principles of morality and the rights of private property. "We want freedom," they say, "but we do not want license. We claim the right to choose the man who is to make pate de foie gras of us, but farther than this we do not go."

And what are the men doing? How do they regard the strike and the strikers? Well, the men are very indignant; they swear by everything that is profane that if the strikers do not come to their senses, they will send the militia to shoot them. "We are not going to stand such nonsense," they say. "Shall we surrender our rights to the caprice of stupid geese? Shall a goose have the right to choose her eater and the time to be eaten? What an absurdity! Geese must obey and make no remarks. Think of the suffering which we would have to endure, if we cannot get pate de foie gras when we crave for it!"

To this the geese reply as follows: "Our livers belong to us, not to you. You can take them by force, but you are not entitled to them. You speak of the suffering which our freedom would cause you, but what about our suffering? Think of the suffering which we endure by being made into pate de foie gras when we are not ready for such an operation!"

Some men, to their disgrace be it said, are inclined to think that the geese are right. They say that when the geese get their freedom, they will look nicer and the pate de foie gras will taste sweeter; but such men are not very numerous and by the majority of men they are regarded as sinful wretches who are in conspiracy with the geese.

According to the latest reports, the strike shows no sign of abatement. The geese do not wish to make any compromises with men; they are confident that in the end they will win the strike. The men are of a different opinion; they are anxious to put an end to the strike, but they have not called the militia out yet. Some men are in favor of arbitration, but up to date they have not found an arbitrator to suit them. I have very little influence with my brother men, but I will advise them to appoint Anthony Comstock as an arbitrator. He is the right kind of a man to settle the strike to the satisfaction of all.

The Children of Plural Love.

BY J. WM. LLOYD.

My generous friend, Dr. Foote, has been treating the readers of Lucifer lately to a somewhat rambling criticism of the ideals of love-variety. As near as I can get at his not very clearly defined position he favors single as against plural love and believes that the conventional home of the day is better for child culture than a free-love home could be.

Dr. Foote pays his respects to me personally, also, but quite vaguely. I am an "iridescent dreamer," and my plan has never been tried except by the Oneida Communists and they did not try it at all because they were against central loves. That is about the size of his case against me.

I consider it a compliment to be called an "iridescent dreamer." The ideal, the plan, the dream, must always go before every excellent action, and when Nature is ashamed of her rainbows I shall be ashamed that my ideals are iridescent. Until then I hope Iris will always paint my dreams.

In order to fairly judge any ideal it should be allowed to show itself at its best. I propose therefore to take Dr. Foote's ideal, as I suppose it to be, and state it in its most favorable form in fair comparison with my own ideal, stated in equally favorable form.

I will suppose, then, that we have a monogamic family of husband, wife and five children; that husband and wife are devoted to each other, and that the children are cared for as well as the love and intelligence of the parents can direct.

Let us suppose a second family of two central lovers, five children and two side lovers for each of the central ones; the the mother having had three children by her central lover and one child by each of her side lovers. And let us suppose the same harmony pervading all the members of this second family as we find in the first.

Now looking at the children alone, which is where Dr. Foote wishes us to look, in what way will the children in family No. 1 be better off than the children in family No. 2?

In each case the children are with the mother. In each case they have love, food, care, education. In each case they have about them an atmosphere of refinement, harmony and kindness.

I can see only one argument that Dr. Foote can bring to bear, and that is that the two children by the side lovers will see less of their fathers than the others. This is probably true as according to my ideal the mother will give most of her love and time to her central love and he will be most in her presence. But if they see a little less of their fathers by blood they are by no means deprived of the father-love influence. It will be precisely the spirit of such a family to in everything break down narrow, selfish, exclusive feeling, and for one father to pick out his own child and give all his caresses to that would be to violate the central principle of broad, generous, human love.

It seems to me only reasonable and probable that in such a family each father will love all the children, without much distinction, and that the children will grow perfectly accustomed to the idea of several fathers just as to several uncles, aunts or cousins. The surest way to a mother's heart is to love her child, and a man would be a great fool who should try to keep her love while neglecting any of her children. I contend that in such a family a man will love a woman's children not because they are his, but because they are hers and because she loves them.

Assuming this point to be settled, and that the children in family No. 2 are not deprived of father-love, is it not plain that because they have three fathers they have more father-love than if they had only one?—three times as much, perhaps?

If there is but one father, and he is absorbed in business, or buried in books, or sick, the children are deprived of all father-love for the time, but if there are more, then the second or third father can pet and entertain them while the first is occupied. Where one father has one taste, as for books, and another another taste, as for horses, and a third loves nature we will say, then the children get the benefit of all these various influences in balancing and shaping their lives. And while one child is being read to at home, another may be having a ride, and the others a walk in the woods.

Is not that better than the one father plan?

Sickness and death respect no ideals, and if the husband in family No. 1 gets sick or dies the children are deprived of the father's love and support, but in family No. 2 if one father sickens or dies there are two others to love and help the mother and support and protect the children. Which is better?

In family No. 1 if the wife dies the children have no mother and the father is in a lonely and difficult position. But if the mother dies in family No. 2 there are two more mothers to love and care for them, because they love their father, and he is aided and comforted. Which is better?

And, leaving out sickness and death, these side loves of the man are a great gain to the children in No. 2. Just the same advantage will accrue to the children from having more than one mother as accrues from having more than one father. For instance, if the central-love mother wishes to go to a picnic or a theater she may leave the children with a side-love mother instead of a servant or hireling.

Is there no advantage in this?

And is it not likely that all this breadth and generosity of sentiment, this absence of the narrow and jealous, will develop a nobler, broader nature, sweeter, kinder, in the children who experience it, than the close drawn lines of family No. 1?

Consider this point well.

But in real life there is no assurance of harmony no matter what the ideal. Dr. Foote wants a "lasting family," but if discord comes in such, how about the children? Does it improve them to remain in an atmosphere of quarrels, hatred and disgust?

In a free-love family if the parents cannot agree they separate and the children remain with the mother till old enough to choose for themselves. Which is better?

Again, no matter what the ideal, hearts will wander and new loves creep into them. If this occurs in family No. 1 there is total wreck. Fidelity to the ideal requires that in this case the parents shall cease to love each other, nay, more, that they shall hate each other even with a murderous hate. What of all this to the children? And what of the "lasting family?"

But if this occurs in family No. 2 fidelity to the ideal requires that all the old parties shall love each other as before, but that each shall open his heart to the new comer with friendship and sympathy if not with love.

What effect will this have on the children?

I submit all this to Dr. Foote, and claim that of a truth my "dream" is much more "iridescent" than his.

And to the readers of Lucifer, that they judge betwe[illegible]

Love Relations.

BY LUCINDA B. CHANDLER.

The continued article of E. B. Foote, M. D.,—"One or Many Loves," seemed to me exceptionally sensible, clear and [illegible]ed in sentiment. But he begins with the claim that "the problem of love relations is a puzzling one." Is not the puzzle the idea of love? Is it not that an attraction which, whether momentary, or more or less permanent, affords a pleasurable sensation is called love?

According to Mr. Harman's definition of love as "the uniting, combining, organizing, creative force of the universe, . . . the refining, purifying, uplifting, glorifying, happifying force of the universe," love must be an attraction in which is stability, exclusiveness, mutual giving, loyalty, idealization, devotion, constancy. A combining organizing force cannot be desultory, fleeting, changeful. An uplifting, refining, glorifying force cannot be inconstant, and regardless of the consequences to all parties concerned of that inconstancy.

Such attractions as are evanescent and void of devotion, loyalty and stability have no quality that deserves to be called love. The conjugal love, that which truly unites man and woman, which is a blending of complementary qualities, is necessarily an exclusive love because it is the agency of the organizing, creative force of the universe. Was ever an organization effected by elements that were continually seeking change, different direction, separation?

The "heat" of the brute animal when the reproductive forces are climaxing is not love. Neither is such a climaxing of the life force when a purely physical impulse in the human animal. There is only impulsion and sensation.

"He must be in love," said the comrade of a youth who had indulged in freedom—the physical impulse, when it was discovered that he had forsaken the habit, and that his comrade was devoting himself to one woman of well known worth.

There is nothing "uplifting" and "glorifying" in the animal life force. It is purely a propagative force in the human as well as in the brute.

The uplifting and glorifying of love is the exercise of the divine qualities of the human being, of benevolence, tender regard for the well being and happiness of its object, seeking to bestow as well as to enjoy delight in companionship. No sex relation void of these is love. When these nobler sympathies are active, unabridged freedom of person is lost sight of.

"Those who value unabridged liberty (freedom?) above all things, and wish to indulge every impulse without reserve, will not talk of the beauties of home life, or expect to enjoy the fruits of a constant and tender devotion necessary to the formation of a life companionship," says Dr. Foote. "Liberty, under any circumstances, costs something, and the question always to be met is, whether it be worth the cost, and whether there be not something else in way of comfort, well being or love that we would prefer at the same price."

The essence of liberty is opportunity. For what do we need or desire opportunity? Is a human being only an aggregate of impulses? Is man a butterfly or a bee? Is freedom to wander, to gather the sweets of pleasurable sensation and live on them the sum of human existence? If so, unabridged freedom is the great desideratum.

But if the development of worthy character, of nobler qualities, of aspiration and all that distinguishes the human from the brute is the opportunity needed and desired, it can only be fully enjoyed in the home life. And home life is a love center, a center of devotion, of offices of mutual helpfulness, mutual consideration and loyalty. It must be this center to two or more persons, and ephemeral attractions cannot sustain it. For the perpetuation of the race this love center must be man and woman, and for the organizing of the form, not only, but the "uplifting and glorifying" of the family and the race the center is one supreme exclusive love.

Io Triomphe.

BY C. L. JAMES.

Since I have got out of the arena alive, it seems suitable to bestow a parting bellow on my anonymous friend "Matadore," who is evidently sensible of having been tossed. Some years since, I registered a vow never to be drawn again, as "Zeno" once drew me, into refuting an indefinite sequence of argumenta ad hominem—a Latin phrase, familiar among logicians, for which I assure "Matadore" that I had no occasion to rummage any dictionary. The argument ad hominem, being a notoriously fallacious one, refutes itself; and "Zeno" taught me (what I might have known before) that there is no advantage in tackling such arguments separately, because they grow like hydra's heads. Consequently, I shall make no further comment on "Matadore's" personal compliments than to say that I committed none of the mistakes he attributes to me; and that talk from him about making abuse do duty for reason is richer than an Individualist like Rockefeller. Whether this be so or not, I appeal to those who read our articles. If I were disposed to wrangle I might add that when "Matadore" says I did not answer his unintelligible leading questions, because I did not know, "not because I was a coward;" I humbly presume this to be "sarkasm," and would modestly ask why I should not be afraid of an opponent who understands English better than Webster, Spanish better than Cervantes, and Anarchism better than Anarchists? (Anarchists, always excepting one dogmatical Individualist in Boston, have taken a very different view of my qualifications to write on Anarchism from "Matadore's.")

When "Matadore" states his own position, however, he is worth answering; not because it is at all original, but for just the opposite reason. It represents a cant, by no means uncommon, and likely, therefore, to be very pernicious. "Matadore" thinks me like the bull which tried conclusions with the locomotive. He sees no sense in being a thousand years ahead of time—like me. He believes in evolution. He works for gradual elimination of injustice. Did "Matadore" ever hear of the "eliminator" who, having been stopped by a river, sat down and waited for it to run dry? This philosopher believed in evolution. It is very probable that a thousand years hence the Chippewa river will no longer divide Eau Claire. But meanwhile, I am so much in favor of revolution as to see many advantages in a bridge. Nay, I can see advantages in having two. I think race-culture has a function which cannot, as "Matadore" imagines, be effected by eliminating unjust institutions. I also think that intelligent race-culture is impossible without eliminating such unjust institutions as marriage "in any form." And, what I do not expect "Matadore" to understand, I can give reasons for thinking so which have nothing to do with any quibbles about the meaning of any ist or ism. The inductive method—the study of history and anthropology—teaches me that before institutions can be eliminated natural and sexual selection improve men up to the point of disliking them. The same method teaches me also that when institutions have become unpopular, their beneficiaries still make a sturdy fight for their perpetuation; and there is no such thing as eliminating them without a crisis of the revolutionary type.

Two hundred and forty years ago, almost all intelligent educated people appear to have believed in witchcraft. Two hundred years ago the belief, in England and America, had been given up for a vulgar superstition by all intelligent educated people except a strong minority of the clergy. This was pretty rapid progress. A long process of evolution lay behind. Millennia of race-culture, sorely hindered by marriage in various forms, had been necessary to produce a Bacon and a people who would hear a Bacon. Bacon himself believed in witchcraft. But his disciple Hobbes saw that Bacon's method cut away the foundation of this belief. And in forty years after being impugned, it had become powerless. "Matadore's" inherited belief that to prevent "invasion" we must organize professional "invaders" into a trust and call them a government is just as absurd as Bacon's belief in witchcraft. No one believes any such thing for any other reason than that he has always heard it assumed and never heard it disputed until lately. But now it has been disputed. Evolution has produced men who see through it.

> "And then it started like a guilty thing > Upon a fearful summons."

In forty years more it will, like witchcraft just after the Salem object lesson, be defended only by a harmless minority of ministers, old grannies, Dogberrys, Falstaffs and "Matadores." I assure all interested that I have no unkind feeling, such as "Matadore" complains of, towards people of this sort—only that kind of pity expressed in the following dirge, which we used to sing in my school days at the end of a term.

> "See those poor fellows, with Euclid before 'em, > They'll never get over the pons asinorum."

Mrs. H. C. Garner contributes ten dollars worth of her very excellent little book, "Bureka—How to Cure a Cold." Price, 10 cents each.

The object of this fund is to send sample copies and trial subscriptions to those who have not yet been made acquainted with Lucifer's educational work in sexologic science.

THE WORST "trust"—the parent trust—is the marriage trust.

THE WORST "monopoly"—the parent monopoly, is the control of sex—the creative function—by church and state, by priest and judge.

THE WORST "government" is patriarchal family government, setting the pace for, giving character to, all other governments—of school, of church, of state, of nation, empire, etc.

THE BEST "strike," the strike of strikes, is the strike of mothers—a strike for self-ownership and for freedom of opportunity, by the working class—sex—who produce new human beings. All other strikes, by miners and other wage slaves, will fail of lasting success until this fundamental strike shall have been won.

THE BEST "revolution," the revolution of revolutions, is that which aims at the emancipation of woman from sex slavery. No political revolution—by ballots or bullets—will ever realize—"materialize"—freedom and justice for man until the battle for free womanhood and motherhood shall first be crowned with the laurel wreath of victory.

OUR PATERNAL government protects the coal lords from foreign competition under the plea that this is the way to protect labor. The situation in Virginia and elsewhere, as shown by the most reliable reports, demonstrates the utter insincerity of this plea. This result of national legislation in the alleged interest of labor, is simply what all might have expected who study the history of human government. Lawmakers work for those who pay them best. The same of judges, lawyers and all other public officials, and it seems hopeless to expect any other result under our present social systems, beginning with the most unjust and inequitable of them all, our marriage institution.

Play vs. Work.

Says C. L. James, see his very interesting article in last Lucifer entitled, "From Morality to Savoir Faire,"

"'The play instinct is the creative instinct.' The blowing off of that surplus force accumulated in every healthy organism is not to be called work; but it is the most useful—the only original—exercise of power. It follows that labor is, as was always thought before there were moralists, a primitive curse, and not a primitive blessing. The end of work is to gain time for play by getting rid of work."

The "moral" of all this would seem to be, Let work and play go hand in hand; or, perhaps better still, Let work be made so attractive that it will no longer be work but simply play.

This appears to have been the great secret of the success of the "Oneida Perfectionists," in making what they called "Heaven on Earth." To an extent almost unheard of before, these people practicalized the art of turning work into play. The chief means by which this was accomplished was by frequent change of occupation—change of employment and change of workfellows. "Variety is the spice of life." It is monotony that kills, rather than work, in itself considered.

Hence one reason why specialists, craftsmen, artists, professionals, etc., whose work is one continuous round of repetitions, so often resort to intoxicants to relieve the ennui of their lives, and also why they so often commit suicide—by violence sometimes but more often by slow and imperceptible methods.

Acting upon these suggestions Lucifer's scribe expects soon to take a summer outing. Work in office is very pressing, and little means of hiring substitutes in his absence, but some volunteer aid has been accepted, and the expense of the trip has been mainly provided for by those interested in Lucifer and its work. While it is hoped that change of employment, change of air and change of association will be beneficial to health of body and to sanity of mind, it is also hoped that the work of Lucifer can be even more efficiently carried forward by an occasional outing than by continuous stay in office.

Meantime our friends at home and abroad are fraternally requested to do what they can to hold up the hands of Daughter Lillian, who remains in charge of the office, and who expects to take her turn at the vacation business soon after the return of her paternal relative.

The first point to be visited is Cleveland, Ohio, where the said scribe expects to meet the "Franklin Club" and other reform societies of the beautiful "Forest City," thence a short sojourn will probably be made at the famous summer resort at Lake Brady near Kent, Ohio, returning to Chicago probably about the 25th of the present month.

Sociologic Lesson. No. XXXXVI.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

MILLIONAIRES. A man with an immense income from accumulated property, is not in a position antagonistic to the community. Whether he has come into possession of it rightfully, or, as in the case of the large landed estates in Great Britain, wrongfully, is a question of the past, which I am not now considering. The income results from the use of the property by persons who estimate its use to be worth to them all that they pay. So the collection of the income injures no one. If he invests it, he furnishes increased facilities, and thus benefits the community. If he leaves it idle in the bank, it is still loaned t those who can make use of it, the banker enjoying the interest. If he keeps it in his safe, it can there harm no one. If he spends it, he furnishes employment to laborers. It is impossible for him to keep it or to use it in ordinary ways without benefitting the community.

The amount of the benefit conferred in spending it, depends largely upon the manner in which it is spent. If he spends it for articles which are destroyed, all that the community gets is the profit in producing those articles. But if he spends it for articles of permanent value, the community is also benefited by the addition of those articles to the world's stock of goods, articles which sooner or later will be distributed to others.

PER CONTRA.

From my view-point:

"A man with an immense income from accumulated property" is, necessarily, in a position very "antagonistic to the community." An immense income means immense power over the lives and welfare of other men, and "power, like a desolating pestilence, pollutes whate'er it touches."

"Whether he has come into possession of it rightfully," or not, is not an open question. No man can come into the possession of an immense fortune rightfully! Legally he may, but law and right are often, if not generally, the antipodes of each other. Great fortunes are obtained and perpetuated by robbery, as in the case of landed estates (rent), or by taking advantage of the ignorance, the necessities, the imbecility or the improvidence of others, (interest and profits).

"The income" of the rich man does not "result from the use of the property by persons who estimate its use to be worth to them all that they pay"—except in cases where the users borrow for the purpose of speculative profits, in which case the user becomes, like the man from whom he borrows, a robber. The borrower usually pays interest, or rent, because he is compelled by his necessities, real or imaginary, to pay unjust tribute to the holder of accumulated "property," be this property in the shape of land, tools (machinery), or the product of labor upon land or other crude forms of natural wealth, or in the shape of that privileged aristocrat and licensed robber among commodities, known as legal tender money.

In brief, and with my limited vision, these lines embrace the main points of Mr. Parkhurst's "Lesson No. XXXXIV." The natural and inevitable result of the working of the social system advocated in this lesson is seen in the condition of the miners now on a strike against their plutocratic lords, the mine owners and "operators;" in the condition of the operatives in the factories and sweat-shops of the country; also in the condition of all who perform really productive labor in any department of human industry.

It is well that we have all sides presented, so far as our limited space will allow, and Mr. Parkhurst is doing necessary reform work by putting in concise form the arguments of the monopolist and the plutocrat, with whom as individuals, I for one, have no quarrel; regarding them as victims of an abnormal and vicious social system, rather than as wilful wrongdoers.

M. H.

Again, "The Right to Work."

BY HENRY E. ALLEN.

H. M. Parkhurst says he admits himself an "ancient number" having outlived the socialistic community of "Brook Farm," fifty years ago. It seems that settled socialism with him. How do I know that the experimenters at "Brook Farm" were not the enemies of socialism, and made this failure simply to make a record against it? Thousands of socialists believe their plan of government is not practicable by any small, isolated community surrounded by competition. Why did not this gentleman who believes in the beautiful dog-eat-dog system of the present refer his readers to the post office department, our public school system and other socialistic features of our government today? In fact this teacher of gold standard economics might have stated that every feature of our government today worth a fig is socialistic.

I will say in closing that my ideal of human government is ANARCHY. A civilized human being is capable of self government, and when all become sufficiently civilized all should have the opportunity to govern themselves. I hold that socialism is the best school for such development. When the people absolutely rule themselves it will be but a small matter to lop off this law and that until there will be but one supreme law—the right to do what we choose so long as we do not intringe on the rights of others.

I feel as positive that the present competitive system contains the seeds of its own destruction as I feel sure that right will finally triumph.

If the present system will do, and is doing now, why is it necessary for Mr. Parkhurst to argue for its continuance? Haven't people sense enough to know that there isn't any perceptible difference between republicanism and democracy, and that the trifling remedies each party proposes could not possibly bring prosperity to the masses so long as the present system of private monopoly is allowed? I tell you, we are learning these important truths rapidly in spite of our Parkhursts and corporation-controlled politicians. I will leave the subject here and turn our economic teacher over to the tender mercies of C. L. James.

PREJUDICE and intolerance are the fruits of ignorance. Herbert Spencer, in the "Studies of Sociology," speaks of the surprise with which a monogamist first learns of the existence of other systems of marriage. "So unlike our own," says Spencer, "we cannot at first, imagine that they are practiced with a sense of propriety like that with which we practice ours." Yet Livingstone tells of intelligent Kandyan women who upon hearing that in England a man has only one wife were very much disgusted and expressed themselves as "perfectly scandalized" at the utter barbarism of the English. It was, they said, so like the monkeys.

THE ONEIDA COMMUNITY copied its system of free love marriage, or as the scientists defined it, "complex marriage," from the "primitive church" and the origin, example and teachings of Jesus. Rev. J. H. Noyes, its founder, proved this conclusively in his book "The Berean." No attempt was ever made to refute that work. The monogamous preaching and polygamous practicing clergy concluded that the only way to answer his arguments was to invoke the law to break up his community. It was the only Christian organization on earth that practiced the teachings of Jesus. They believed in and practiced freedom in love only among those of their faith or religion.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER L.

Thus the weeks passed away and Christmas was drawing near when the mail brought a letter from Margaret to her mother. A cry of joy broke from her lips as she read its contents.

"What is it?" cried the girls in chorus.

"O, listen! It is almost too good to be true!"

"And now, dearest mamma, let me wind up this epistle by a little bit of news. By some strange and opportune circumstance we have no engagement for two weeks, beginning with Christmas morning, and now I mean to join that precious circle for a short time, of which I have heard so much. O, you don't know how impatient I am as the time draws near. I am longing, am homesick for you all. It is sweet, this thing called fame and homage, to be greeted and rewarded with applause, but the heartfelt affection of your loved ones is something different, and O, so much more satisfying."

This indeed was news and joy. Imelda knelt at Mrs. Leland's side, laying her head upon her motherly knee.

"O, I am so glad, so glad! for once our circle will be complete." Glancing up her eyes met those of Cora. The look of pain and silent reproach therein pierced to her very heart. Hastily rising, with a quick step she was at Cora's side, winding her arms about her she laid her face to hers.

"Forgive me, little sister, for a moment I forgot that we cannot be complete until one more noble man, your own Owen, shall have joined us."

Cora smiled through her tears.

"There is nothing to forgive, only sometimes I grow so hungry, so heart hungry, so love hungry. I know everyone here loves me, yet——"

"Yet the supreme love, the love of him who makes life's sunshine for you, is wanting; is not that so? But why, little one, do you not send him the word which will bring him to you?"

"I do not know; but I have the feeling that for some reason it would be useless. I will wait a little while longer."

So a few more days went by and at last Christmas morning dawned. A solitary watcher paced up and down the platform in front of the depot awaiting the arrival of the incoming train, his impatience not permitting him to seek the warmth indoors as many others were doing. Up and down, up and down, he paced, the dark eyes glowing in their suppressed eagerness when at last the whistle sounded on the clear, crisp air and a few minutes later the thundering train discharged its load of human freight, and was again puffing away on it eastern course. A tall, fair-haired woman was seen casting searching glances about when a pair of arms were laid upon her shoulders. She was gently turned about, almost at the same moment a pair of mustached lips pressing hers,

"Margaret, my rare, sweet Margaret!"

"Wilbur!" Another kiss followed, then quickly she was assisted to a seat in the waiting cutter, snugly tucked in with warm robes and furs and in a few minutes more they were speeding along over the frozen snow.

"My mother, is she well? and Imelda, and Alice, and her babies, and all the rest whom I have not yet seen, are they all well and happy?"

Wilbur laughed. "One question at a time if you please, my girlie. But as to each and all I can give the same answer, so will I answer them all at once with the one little word 'Yes,' and they have sent me alone to greet you, not but one and all are just as eager and impatient to greet and welcome my darling. Only they have kindly conceded the privilege to me to be the first to embrace my girlie, for which I certainly am thankful. For when that bevy of women once have you in their clutches——there now! I retract that word, but it is certain when they have secured you I may not hope to again speak to you in a hurry. For some time at least they will own you."

By this time they were leaving the turmoil and noise of the city in their rear and as the road was a quiet and deserted one the arm of the young driver gently stole about the slender waist of the woman at his side. Nothing loath the fair head rested against his shoulder while the blue eyes looked up into the black ones with love unutterable. Again their lips met in a clinging kiss.

"O sweetheart and lover, it seems so good once more to be able to nestle in your arms."

To press her still more closely was his only answer. Thus laughing and talking, loving and kissing, they enjoyed to the utmost that drive in the crisp, cold air, and soon they arrived at their destination, where many open arms were extended to receive the fair Margaret

"My darling!" and

"My own mamma!" were the caressing words exchanged as Mrs. Leland folded her daughter to her heart. But not for long was she permitted to hold her there. Imelda's brown eyes were beaming with love and pleasure. Alice was eager for a kiss, her two pretty babies wanted to be made over by this new auntie. Then Imelda drew her aside where the hazel-eyed Cora was standing with one arm laid lovingly about the shoulders of a pale-faced young man. Margaret needed no introduction. By letter she had long since known of the finding of both of Imelda's wayward ones, and a single glance told her all. She took the girl's face between her hands and gently kissed the cherry lips.

"I am so glad for your own as well as for Imelda's sake."

This was her greeting and Cora understood, for her eyes filled with tears. Frank's hand she took between both of hers and knelt at his side.

"And you are the brother I have so often heard her speak about. For Imelda's sake you must be my brother also, as my own brother has been absent for so long a time I can scarce remember him."

Frank's face became sad and his eyes misty.

"O, but your own brother is so much more deserving than I. Would that my record were as clean."

Margaret shook her head.

"Not so downcast and self-reproachful, my boy. We are so much the creatures of circumstances we cannot well help doing just the things we do. The past you have done with, only the future is yours, to make that what it should be will be your task, your duty, your pleasure."

In his turn Frank shook his head,

"No! no! even that boon will be denied me. My bad deeds can't be undone; to atone for them will not be permitted me. My days, my hours, even, are numbered. No, no, please don't. I understand what you would say. Why should such a truth-loving woman as you seek to deceive me. I know it all, and I suppose it is best so. Look, there at your mother's side another waits to welcome you, one who is nearer and dearer to you than such a poor wreck of humanity as I could ever dare hope to be."

Following the direction indicated by Frank Margaret saw, standing at her mother's side, an arm thrown caressingly about her shoulders, a young man as yet almost a boy, fair sunny locks thrown carelessly back from a broad and open brow, a look of longing in the frank blue eyes, and suppressed emotion quivering about the sensitive mouth.

Slowly Margaret drew herself up to her full height, with her eyes fastened on that boyish and yet manly form. Was it—O was it——? Her mother's hand went up to his face and drew it close to her own, holding it there, the other hand she extended to her daughter. With bated breath Margaret crossed the room.

"Is it——"

"Your brother."

Then both of Margaret's hands were extended and both were clasped firmly and tenderly, and,

"Osmond!"

Margaret!"—spoken in a breath, and Margaret knew that at last her mother has had her one heart's desire; her boy, her baby is once more her own, and the sister is clasped in her brother's embrace.

"O, this is indeed a merry Christmas, and you are the nicest Christmas gift I could have wished for. But how is it, mamma, that you have not written this to me?"

"Because I so sincerely hoped and believed that you would make it possible to spend a week with us, and I wanted to surprise you. Have I succeeded?"

"Indeed you have, my darling mamma. But is this boy always so tongue-tied, having just nothing at all to say?"

Osmond laughed,

"I believe you are a saucebox! But that isn't a bit nice of me, is it? to call you names in the first moments of our acquaintance—with the first words I address to you. I promise you to try and do better and say something nice. I don't believe you are easily spoiled and feel that I may tell you, that already I am proud of my sister. I think they have named you well—Margaret. A daughter of the Gods, divinely tall and most divinely fair——"

"For shame, Osmond, to try to pay your sister compliments in such wornout phrases."

A laugh followed and the ice was broken. Margaret felt and knew that she should love this brother. As the days of the following week glided by she gradually came to know all there was to tell and to learn. Osmond told her all about the father who so opposed his coming here, when by accident he had discovered that it was the boy's mother he daily went to see; of the battle he had fought and how he had come off conqueror; of how there had been much in common with them; but that of late he was daily drifting more and more away from his father; then of how he had come into this circle, and of how he had gradually come to hear and then understand their ideas; how he had come to know and understand what true womanhood and manhood were, what they meant, and that he now knew that his mother and sister were sweet and pure and true, notwithstanding the teachings of his father.

Then Margaret had come to know the sisters of Wilbur, and knew not which was the most love-worthy, the stately Edith or the sweet, gentle Hilda. She saw the hightened color in the cheeks of the former, when the young physician was holding her attention; she saw the sparkling light in the eyes of the latter and the answering light in those of Lawrence Westcot; the adoration in Imelda's glance as it rested on the splendid figure of Norman Carlton, who indeed she found to be all her friend had said of him. "One of nature's noblemen" was the best she knew how to define him. But to which, indeed, of the manly faces and forms should she not have applied the same appellation? And O, how she enjoyed the society of this bright circle! how swiftly the hours and days flew by. How soon she knew her short vacation would be over and that again she must away to her work.

She loved her work but she could not help feeling sad that her visit would be of such short duration. She would nestle closer to Wilbur's side, and just a little more passion would creep into her kisses when she was folded against his heart, at the thought of the coming separation.

So the first week of her vacation neared its close, and all felt more than ever before the rapid flight of time, when one evening Norman joined the circle holding a telegram aloft.

"Look," he said, "this announces the visit of a friend of olden days, a college mate, a most precious fellow whom I will turn over to the tender mercies of our ladies; a splendid fellow, wholesouled and true. Maybe you girls can make another addition to our circle. He is well worth the winning even though he be a married man."

VARIOUS VOICES.

Sarah C. Campbell, Roodhouse, Ill.:—Every day I am stronger in the belief that the emancipation of woman is the next thing in Evolution. Nature will bring it about. The writers and workers for Lucifer are a part of nature, impressed with the idea that this is their special work, and can have no peace of mind unless they do what they can. Therefore enclosed find fifty cents with the promise of more if needed when it can be spared. Your "A New Society" in late Lucifer is grand, as also is "Old and New" and "Proofs of Atheism."

Frank D. Blue, Terre Haute, Ind.:—Two or three days ago I received a sample copy of Lucifer. I have a quarter and you publish Lucifer, and I believe I'll derive greater pleasure and benefit by sending you the quarter than in any other way of disposal; so kindly send me Lucifer as long as this pays for. I've been quite taken with "Hilda's Home" and would like to read the whole story. What will it cost for back numbers?

You can send me a few tracts for distribution in lieu of the books mentioned, as I'm a missionary in my way, albeit not one recognized as orthodox. Yours for freedom.

[The price of back numbers to whole No. 613—or fifty-six issues, is now one dollar, which is less than the yearly price of the paper.]

B. F. Hyland, Corvallis, Oregon:—Enclosed find eight names with four dollars to pay six months subscription for each, as I desire to help disseminate the great light you have created. Myriads of ages ago a band of fierce robbers came down out of the Himalaya mountains who were so strong, so aggressive and unscrupulous that they conquered, subdued and utilized the human beings they found on the lowlands, the same as they used the common domestic animals. The descendants of these robbers today control the wealth of Christendom. They have often changed their name but their nature never changes. They claim superhuman power and knowledge. By a strange compound of deception and force, called "matrimony" they have enslaved the female portion of humanity and by thus enslaving the mothers they find it easy to perpetuate their power over the race as a whole. Upon this system of fraud and force you have turned the search light of Lucifer in a way to astonish those who are slow to think.

Samuel Ragendorf, Cincinnati, O.:—Am willing to learn all I can pertaining to sociology,—heredity, or anything and everything on sex. Have an immense library on these subjects. Am more than pleased with your "Freethought and Logic," in No. 668 of Lucifer. The average mortal does imagine that free love means lust or licentiousness. Why not issue a small pamphlet describing in plain simple words, so that anyone can understand, what free love really means. Have you such? If so I would be pleased to receive it. Begin my subscription with the number containing the first of the series of articles on "Contagious Diseases," by Northcote.

[Replying to the above and to many similar questions I would say that the pamphlets, "Motherhood in Freedom," "When Love is Liberty and Nature Law," "Love and the Law," "What the Young Need to Know," and "Discussion of the Social Question," give fairly good outlines of what is meant by Lucifer's writers when using the term free love. Also the article, "A Free Man's Creed," published in No. 653 of Lucifer. For larger works on this subject we commend such treatises as the "New Ideal," by Emil Ruedebusch, and the other books advertised under the head "Library of Sexology." M. H.]

LOVE, MARRIAGE, AND DIVORCE

And the Sovereignty of the Individual.

A Discussion between Henry James, Horace Greely, and Stephen Pearl Andrews. There are here included the final replies of Mr. Andrews, refused by the New York Tribune, and a subsequent discussion, occurring twenty years later, between Mr. James and Mr. Andrews.

"The great lesson for the world to learn is that HUMAN BEINGS DO NOT NEED TO BE TAKEN CARE OF. What they do need is such conditions of justice and freedom and friendly co-operation that they can take care of themselves. Provided for by another, and subject to his will as the return tribute, they pine, and sicken, and die. This is true equally of women as of men; as true of wives as it is of vassals or serfs. Our whole existing marital system is the house of bondage and the slaughter-house of the female sex. Whether its evils are inherent or incidental, whether they belong to the essence or are the administration of the institution, whether they are remediable without or only by means of revolution, are the questions that now have to be discussed."

THIRD SERIES, VOL. I., No. 33. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, AUGUST 18, E. M. 297. [C. E. 1897.] WHOLE No. 672.

The Cloud Confines.

The day is dark and the night
To him that would search their heart:
No lips of cloud that will part
Nor morning song in the light;
Only, gazing alone,
To him wild shadows are shown,
Deep under deep unknown
And height above unknown height.
Still we say as we go,—
"Strange to think by the way,
Whatever there is to know,
That shall we know one day."

The Past is over and fled:
Named new, we name it the old;
Thereof some tale hath been told,
But no word comes from the dead;
Whether at all they be,
Or whether as bond or free,
Or whether they too were we,
Or by what spell they have sped.
Still we say as we go,—
"Strange to think by the way,
Whatever there is to know,
That shall we know one day."

What of the heart of hate
That beats in thy breast, O Time?—
Red strife from the furthest prime,
And anguish of fierce debate:
War that shatters her slain,
And peace that grinds them as grain,
And eyes fixed ever in vain
On the pitiless eyes of Fate.
Still we say as we go,—
"Strange to think by the way,
Whatever there is to know,
That shall we know some day."

What of the heart of love
That bleeds in thy breast, O Man?—
Thy kisses snatched 'neath the ban
Of fangs that mock them above;
Thy pains prolonged unto knells,
Thy hope that a breath dispels,
Thy bitter forlorn farewells
And the empty echoes thereof?
Still we say as we go,—
"Strange to think by the way,
Whatever there is to know,
That shall we know some day."

The sky leans dumb on the sea,
Aweary with all its wings;
And oh! the song the sea sings
Is dark everlastingly.
Our past is clean forgot,
Our present is and is not,
Our future's a sealed seedplot,
And what betwixt them are we?—
We who say as we go,—
"Strange to think by the way,
Whatever there is to know,
That shall we know one day."

Paragraphs.

BY REV. SIDNEY HOLMES.

David Ellsworth Bates is under arrest in Chicago for the alleged crime of marrying seven women without burying or divorcing any of them. If marriage of one man with one woman is a good thing, why is not the marriage of one man to seven women seven times as commendable?

Rev. John Walstein, while conducting a revival meeting at Epsom, Ind., Aug. 4, shot at some wicked young men who disturbed the congregation. He missed the men he shot at but killed an innocent little girl who was sleeping in her mother's lap. If the Lord is directing Parson Walstein the Lord is a poor marksman.

According to the bible Jesus was never married; he was born out of wedlock; he never performed a marriage ceremony; he never expressed approval of marriage; he recognized no man as his father and no woman as his mother. He was an idealist and in his ideal kingdom he said "They neither marry nor are given in marriage.

Milwaukee clergymen, who are reaping a rich harvest from couples from neighboring states who go to Wisconsin to get married without a license, never inform the couples that the laws of that state do not require any marriage ceremony. The marriage fees in that state are merely tributes wrung from the ignorant.

When the ordinance taxing bicycles was recently passed in Chicago 4,000 patriots rushed to the city hall and paid seventy-five cents a piece for a nine months' license. Within two weeks Judge Tuley declared the law unconstitutional and the city pockets $3,000 of the patriots' money. Voluntary victims of a governmental confidence game deserve little sympathy.

A Monterey, Calif., clergyman has a boat in which he takes loving couples out into the ocean beyond the state's jurisdiction and marries them without a license. Some people refuse to regard marriage as a religious ceremony and others refuse to admit the necessity of a governmental license for the union, but few see the absurdity of permitting either the church or state to meddle in contracts of this nature.

"Would you not prefer sexual association with women whom you respect and have some affection for, rather than with professional prostitutes or any woman you might pick up in the streets?" was a question I put a few days ago to a conventional man of my acquaintance who had informed me he had "no use for the doctrine of free love." Note his answer: "I could not respect a woman who would let me associate with her sexually, unless she was married to me." This from a man who makes no pretensions that he confines his sexual acts to his own wife. What better proof is needed of the debasing influence of the marriage institution on man's nature?

The Spanish Inquisition.

The assassination of Canovas seems to have aroused even the plutocratic press to a realization of the horrible tortures inflicted by his orders upon the majority of the "four hundred persons of all shades of advanced ideas who were suspected of complicity in the Barcelona bomb throwing of last year, and immured in dungeons."

The Chicago "Chronicle" of Aug. 12, gives considerable space to pictures of instruments used in that torture. There are iron torture stocks, flesh hook, leaden scourge, thumb screw, Spanish collar, crushing cage, bone breaking wheel, and several varieties of flesh pinchers, knives, etc. The "Chronicle" gives a column to details of the tortures inflicted on the prisoners. It quotes from the letters of two prisoners, as follows:

"I could not bear the atrocious tortures of so many days. On my arrest I spent eight days without food and drink, obliged to walk continually to and fro, to be flogged, and, as it that did not suffice, I was made to trot as though I was a horse trainer at a riding school, until, worn out with fatigue, I fell to the ground. Then the hangman burned my lips with red-hot irons, and when I declared myself the author of the attempt they replied: 'You do not tell the truth; we know the author is another one, but we want to know your accomplices.'"

Another of the tortured prisoners wrote:

"Imagine the terrible aspect of the Zero at midnight, with two civil guards following and one going in front with a candle in his hand—a staircase that reeks of carbolic. Arrived at the Anti-Zero I am bound up like a sausage; one of them opens the door and lets in another unfortunate victim, who did not utter a sound and passed me like a ghost. I am ordered to undress, or, rather, I am undressed, my hands tied by the wrists and the arms taken backward by a strong cord to the height of the biceps, afterward bound tightly around so that the cord penetrates the flesh. The civil guard, with a stout whip in his hand, says to me: 'You do not want to speak Spanish? I will make you speak before you leave this place!' And, by heavens! he showers a quantity of lashes upon me, on the calves, on the knuckles, everywhere.

"At the end of five minutes I was interrogated and the flogging begins afresh, on both sides of the legs, each lash producing a fresh smile on the countenance of the official. Seeing that I do not speak, they put a gag into my mouth. I was then tied down and the torture recommenced—I cannot finish, the hangmen are coming."

The "Chronicle" adds:

"One of the jailers in the fortress testified that the prisoners were flogged, their nails torn off, their bodies compressed until the agony of suffering led them to sign whatever the inquiring judge wanted them to say. Among other methods used were feeding the prisoners on salt fish, with all water withheld. Eight men were sentenced to be shot; four were sentenced to twenty years of penal servitude; fourteen to nineteen years one month and eleven days; thirteen to nine years and four months; thirty-six to eight years eight months and one day, and the rest were acquitted, but really sent to Rio d'Ore, in Africa, for an indefinite period, and this was in order that none of the prisoners should ever reach their friends and betray the work of the inquisitors. One enthusiastic jailer exhibited a nail torn from the foot of one of the tortured. Then the news was brought from the far-away prisoners declaring that their confessions were false, and that they were made in agony of hunger, thirst, exhaustion, sleeplessness and endless beating, that part of their bodies had been crushed after the gag had been applied for days, as well as manacles and screws, lacerating the flesh by their iron spikes after their bodies had been burned all over with red-hot irons.

"People who saw these prisoners say that their appearance was frightful. Deadly pale, with dull, sunken eyes, reduced to skeletons, with swollen hands and torn mouths, dragging themselves along the ground, unable to stand on their feet, which had been either broken or so tortured as to be unable to hold the weight of their bodies. . . .

"A party of twenty-eight exiled anarchists arrived at Liverpool from Barcelona July 30 and after a brief stay there under police surveillance they proceeded to London on the invitation of sympathizers there. The party included one woman, Teresa Claramunt, the Louise Michel of Spain. . . .

"Two of the men stated that a number of gendarmes under the command of an officer, lashed them to stakes, tied their hands to a beam, and then pressed open the nails of their fingers with a slip of thin wood. This torture was prolonged for more than an hour, and it was terminated by the gendarmes applying pinchers to the nails and dragging them from the finger ends. They were made to walk about the cell for four days and nights continuously, and whenever they showed signs of fatigue they were lashed brutally with a whip. A case was mentioned in which a man went mad under the torture, only to be promptly shot by the gendarmes. The refugees allege that it is the religious question only that has brought about the expulsion. Shortly stated, their explanation is: 'We are not Roman Catholics, but freethinkers'."

The "Chronicle" fails to tell its readers what portion of the "bodies" were compressed, for fear of offending Comstockian "morality." Well may the prisoners of Montjuich exclaim:

> "We wretches cannot tell out all our wrongs
> Without offense to decent, happy folk.
> We must scrupulously hint
> With half-words, delicate reserves, the thing
> Which no one scruples we should feel in full."

Such events as these are enough to make us despair of human progress. The instinctive desire to torture seems ineradicable from the Spanish blood. The Inquisition of the Middle Ages was no more horrible than is this at the end of the nineteenth century. It is now conceded that only two or three of the four hundred arrested were implicated in the affair of which they were accused and tortured into confession.

Yet "our representatives," "our servants," at Washington use "our" money to cable "our" sympathy to the Spanish government. A common murderer may go hang, and justice is done; but when a tyrant who has laid waste the land of Cuba, who has caused the butchery of hundreds and thousands of men and women and helpless little children in their own homes, falls at the hand of a maddened "subject" the nations of the world must go into mourning! What a spectacle for gods and men!

L. H.

A Call for Concerted Action.

To all believers in sexual liberty. GREETING:

A national organization is needed. The time has come when the friends of love, of free, responsible parenthood, should unite for defense and for propaganda. Combined, aggressive work is demanded alike by the constantly-growing revolt against the ignorance and cruelty of existing social institutions and by the necessity of protecting ourselves against the intolerance and consequent persecutions of the devotees of outworn religious and sexual creeds. The deep undercurrent of sane thought touching this vital question should be made effective for the sweeping away of the debris of dead dogmas and mildewed social conventions which now obstruct the normal flow of the stream of progress. Self-respecting free lovers refuse to be longer banned by the semi-religious "Liberals" who assume for themselves the unwon title of Freethinkers. Free thought is worthless without free action, and no priest can be permitted to limit the one or the other, in either the religious or the moral domain.

A national organization of social radicals is needed for these and other purposes:

1. To make the friends of full human liberty acquainted with each other.

2. To create a fund for the printing and free distribution of millions of leaflets and small pamphlets.

3. To systematically increase the circulation of papers and other regular publications devoted to sexual emancipation.

4. To devise and utilize ways and means for reaching the people through ordinary papers, magazines and reviews, and from the platform.

5. To establish bureaus at Washington and the state capitals, (a) to antagonize further invasive moral and sexual legislation, and (b) to agitate for the repeal of existing archaic and reactionary statutes.

We would suggest that there be two classes of members; first, the known, active workers, those who can afford to come out into the open and frankly take part in the struggle, and, second, the passive, contributory, friends of the cause, those who, because of family, business, or other considerations, cannot afford to align themselves in the division of public propagandists.

The membership fee is to be one dollar per year in each class. In the public class the payment of this sum gives the right to vote for the election of officers and upon all issues brought up for determination in the annual and other conventions. Contributory members are assured inviolability of confidence but may not vote. At any time, upon written notice, a contributory member may be transferred to the active class, or a member of the active to the contributory class. If deemed advisable, there may be a life membership, upon payment of from fifteen to twenty-five dollars, the rights of life members to be the same as those of annual members, in the two classes, respectively, of active workers and contributors.

For carrying on the work, both propagandistic and defensive, free gifts will be most welcome. Mountains of ignorance and prejudice are to be dug down and blasted away.

The society should hold a convention each year. It will help us to meet and exchange opinions and compare notes of progress; the press can assist us greatly, even if unfair and abusive, for publicity precedes investigation, as investigation antedates acceptance. If we want our light to shine we must set it where it can be seen near and far.

Do you accept the fundamental principle of sexual freedom? Then it is to your interest to join hands with us, either as avowed fellow-workers or as unavowed but substantial helpers. The opportunity to choose the form of sex expression personally and mutually agreeable, the liberty and responsibility of the individual, these involving and guaranteeing free motherhood, and thus giving the best possible promise of an improved humanity, are first to be secured. Until we have sexual liberty there can be no real test of the relative merits of the various methods of sex manifestation, of the divergent systems of social and family life.

We hope that all who are in sympathy with the cause of sexual emancipation and with this proposed movement for its advancement will at once send in their names for enrollment in either the active or contributory class. A permanent organization should be perfected in the early autumn, and there is much preparatory work to do in the few intervening months. The names of active members will be published in Lucifer and in such other periodicals as may support the movement. The names of contributory members will, of course, be known only to the officers.

"The number of our warships must be doubled and trebled," says Assistant Secretary of the Navy Roosevelt. "We want more ships and more officers and more men to man them. Battle-ships, armored cruisers and vessels of the torpedo class—the more we have the better." And so on and so on, with all the expansive volubility of a hare-brained, imaginative "boy-man" laying plans to squander other people's money.—New York World.

Popular Follies and Crimes.

BY JAMES S. DENSON.

The New York "World" is of the opinion that the ninety per cent. death-rate among babies in the city's charge "can be reduced to less than thirty per cent. when officials who are responsible for it begin earning the salaries the city pays them." The "World" takes a very hopeless view of the matter, for when did officials ever earn the salaries paid them?

District Attorney Backus of New York says that "every kind of a show that endangers the morals of our women and children should be stopped." Why the morals of our men do not equally need protection I am unable to discern. Perhaps, however, the district-attorney thinks that the female couchee-couchee dancers, about whom he is complaining, have no effect upon the men spectators, their supposed degrading influence acting upon the women and children only.

President G. Stanley Hall, of Clarke University, Worcester, Massachusetts, objects vigorously to the vows the Christian Endeavorers take. He says:

"For a young person to take an oath which extends for years into the future, and which is almost sure to be broken, is a very serious thing."

President Hall is right, but I wonder if he sees the application of his remark? The marriage oath extends not only for "years into the future" but to the end of life, and, as construed by the most orthodox sects, it is eternally binding. It is indeed, "a very serious thing" to take such an oath, an oath "which is almost sure to be broken," in wish if not in physical fact.

Rev. G. Emil Richter, Methodist, of Brooklyn, tells women to keep out of business life if they can, and in the next breath advises them to study the practical affairs of life so that they can talk intelligently upon them. That is the preacher's way of acquainting himself with everyday concerns—theoretically, from the outside, at a safe distance from danger, toil and contamination. Now we need not be surprised to hear Mr. Richter say:

If you must labor, let your occupation be a feminine one. Leave bookkeeping, typesetting and the heavier occupations to men.

I wish the reverend gentleman would inform an ignorant world how he discovers that bookkeeping and typesetting are purely masculine occupations, while, presumably, believing that scrubbing, dishwashing and laundering are "feminine" pursuits, nature-decreed. No doubt there is good reason to contend that setting type is heavier work than cooking for the family, caring for half a dozen children, scrubbing the floors, washing, mending, darning, and doing the other light chores which from time immemorial have been regarded as distinctively "feminine" amusement, "light" and exhilorating. No doubt his reverence for the time-honored is greater than his capacity to think outside of a groove, but, really, it would seem that Rev. Mr. Richter should perceive the utter absurdity of his attempting to advise in matters of which he has no knowledge, as is proved by his utterances. Why cannot he see that a woman, like a man, will do that best which she finds most pleasure in doing? The free worker has always been found the most competent worker; the slave botches always.

"Letter to a Prospective Bride" is the title of a little pamphlet by Ida C. Craddock which contains many valuable suggestions sadly marred by an apparent approval of the institution of legal marriage. It is written in plain yet inoffensive language but with an evident attempt to please the superstitious by its references to the so-called sacredness of marriage. Aside from these faults, which must grieve the judicious rationalist, the pamphlet is well worthy of perusal by every young woman who has had no experience in sexual association. It may be purchased for twenty-five cents from Ida C. Craddock, post office box 2093, Philadelphia, Pa.

A New Outrage.

Albert F. Kent, editor of the "Item" of Newburyport, Mass., was arrested recently on a charge of "obscenity" for having republished in his paper certain portions of Mortimer Warren's "Almost Fourteen." Those of our readers who are familiar with Mr. Warren's book will readily see how strained and far fetched such a persecution is. Bigotry is running riot in these cases. In next week's issue we will give a detailed account of the case, from the pen of E. C. Walker, which article came too late for publication this week.

In the Woods.

As per arrangement mentioned in last Lucifer I left Chicago Friday night the 6th inst, and at 10:30 on Saturday reached Cleveland, one of the most admirably located and most beautiful of cities, the home of many of America's millionaire princes, the home of Mark Hanna—the man who is said to have pulled the wires of the political machine that placed William McKinley on the throne of the falsely named "Republic" known as the United States of America. Besides the honor that is supposed to accrue from his successful management of the Republican campaign last fall, and from his later appointment to the position of United States senator, this man Hanna enjoys the distinction of being a rich and powerful coal baron, that is to say, an extensive monopolist of the surplus natural fuel that should belong equally to all.

Yes, Cleveland is a very beautiful city if we judge it by Euclid avenue, the public square, the Arcade building, the parks, etc., but unfortunately these beautiful features are exceptional; they are not characteristic of the city as a whole. There are vast areas which, by contrast, are anything but beautiful. Among these unsightly areas are the slums, the abodes of the poor, the unprivileged, the disinherited, the submerged classes of human society. The "protected" millionaires of Euclid avenue and the unprotected denizens of the slum districts of the city are as far removed from each other in all that concerns outward environment, common sympathies, tastes, pleasures, culture, hopes, aspirations, etc., as are the alleged denizens of the orthodox heaven and orthodox hell, and, like the inhabitants of that fabled heaven we may reasonably suppose that the dwellers on Euclid avenue derive much of their happiness from seeing the contrast between their own condition and that of those of their own race who have failed to "make their calling and election sure."

An instance of the contrasts to be seen in Cleveland is noted by the "Recorder" of that city, dated August 7, in which some account is given of the "eviction" of certain families from Broadway and Orange streets and the tearing down of their homes and scattering of their goods." These evicted people it seems had been occupying a bit of vacant city land, had been "neither a charge upon charity nor competitors with workmen for a job," but "earning an honest living" and molesting no one. But the ground was wanted for a city park, and so these people were ruthlessly driven off, much as the poor people in the time of William the Norman were driven away from their homes to give room for a hunting park for the king and his courtiers.

If the ground was really needed for a public park it would seem these evicted people should at least have been allowed to move their effects to other unoccupied land. But this they are not allowed to do. The "Recorder" adds:

"The oppressive effects of such evictions could be avoided easily. There is enough vacant land in Cleveland for everybody's use. But in obedience to an evil custom some people who live here and others who never come here, are allowed by law to keep people who do live here, off the land except as they pay tribute to the so-called owners. For that reason the opportunity to use a little park land for homes and candy stands was a boon, and the eviction of the squatters seemed a hardship.

"It is not the eviction from that land, however, that really constitutes the hardship, but the fact that all the acres of vacant land in the city, to some of which the evicted might resort, are closed against them, solely for the purpose of making some people rich without work and with the effect of keeping hosts of others poor though they do work. To end this custom would be to avoid the oppressive effects of proper evictions."

The expounders of the "single-tax" gospel are doing excellent educational work in showing up the iniquities of the landlord system, also the iniquities of the mine-lord system (a branch of landlordism) by which wholesale evictions of working people can be effected for the benefit of other people who do not work, and who do not need the land from which they drive their less fortunate brethren and their helpless families.

The thought obtrudes just here—why is it that men born of women can be so heartless as to treat their fellow humans in a manner so much worse than brutal? Why is it, or how is it, that men can treat their brethren as Mark Hanna, De Armit and others are now treating the miners whose only offense is that they ask enough of their own earnings to enable them to feed and clothe their families, and to lay up a little surplus for sickness or for old age. Looking for causes of such cruelty, are they not found in a theology that hardens the hearts of men to human suffering by teaching the worship of a God who inflicts endless pain upon those who die impenitent, or who decline to accept a bankrupt plan of salvation for sins which they have never consciously committed? Is it not because of the narrowly selfish instincts generated, gestated into, bred into, the victims of church-state marriage? a system built upon the doctrine of ownership of woman and her children by the male "head of the family?" and the doctrine of mutual ownership of wife and husband? the doctrine that each family is a close corporation whose interests must take precedence of all other interests? and that it is right and proper to lay up millions of money for the future use of the surviving members of these close corporations called families?

In other words, is not a barbarous theology and a barbarous marital system,—the "marriage trust,"—one and all responsible for the worse than brutal monopoly of the earth by the fortunate and cunning few?

Leaving Cleveland at 5 P. M. on Saturday I arrived at Lake Brady camp, near Kent, Ohio, some thirty-three miles south eastward of the "Forest City," at which camp in the woods, and along the margin of the beautiful lake, I am now sojourning—trying to gain strength for future work, and meantime doing a little business, taking subscriptions to Lucifer and selling books to the campers, the excursionists and visitors who come to this somewhat famous summer resort in search of health, pleasure, or to investigate what is known as "modern spiritualism" at the Spiritualist camp meeting now in session here.

On my return from this place I expect to stop a few days in Cleveland to meet Lucifer's friends and subscribers at that place. On Sunday the 22nd, I shall be pleased to meet all interested in our work at the hall of the "Franklin Club," at 2 o'clock P. M., corner of Champlain and Seneca streets, in the city aforesaid. M. H.

A Reminder.

Knowing that hundreds of our subscribers are out of employment, and that all feel the pressure of our iniquitous money system—a system that rewards the parasites and robbers who live by the labor of others and punishes those who ask only an equal opportunity to labor and to reap the reward of their labor; knowing the general distress that has followed the adoption of "monometalism" and the granting of special privileges to the favored few, by our lords and masters at Washington and in Wall street and Lombard street, knowing all this, we whose business it is to look after the finances of Lucifer have said but little about arrearages, or the money due to the paper on subscription. Believing that all who have given us their names as subscribers and who continue to take the paper from the post office intend to pay for it when conditions will permit them to do so, we continue sending until ordered to discontinue.

From the ordinary business standpoint, this will be considered very unwise policy, and if Lucifer were published to make money for its publishers then nothing but disaster could be expected to follow such financial management. But money-getting is not Lucifer's mission, but rather the overthrow of the superstitions upon which our money-getting system is built. This being our object we send the paper to all who approve its aims and who are doing what they can, in any and all ways to eliminate the systems that make possible the slaveries, the despotisms, the miseries, the crimes and vices that confront us on every hand.

In order, however, that we may know that Lucifer is read and appreciated, and that those to whom it is sent are doing all they can to help forward its educational work, it is necessary that we hear from those who have fallen behind on subscription. Once more, then, we ask that all those whose time has expired will write us to say whether they wish the paper continued to their address. And when writing to ask a continuance if a remittance can also be sent—if only a few postage stamps, it will be perhaps the best possible evidence to us that the paper is being read and appreciated. We are willing as ever to work on without wages, without pecuniary reward as such, but to do this it is necessary to know that those to whom we send the paper that costs us our time, our labor and our money—or the money of our helpers, appreciate the efforts we are making for the common benefit.

Once more, then, to save time, labor and postage stamps in sending out statements of account, we adopt this method of reminding those whose subscriptions have expired that a remittance from them will be thankfully received, or, if that is not possible, then a few lines to say whether or not the continued visits of Lucifer are desired by the person so notified.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Fred H. McGowan, Safford, Ariz.:—The great majority of the folks here who are not Mormons have left the ancient landmarks of orthodoxy, but many are still held by the superstition of "Holy Matrimony," and it is singular how few will read and investigate upon these lines. Still the leaven is working, and I do not despair of sending in a few subscribers. Enclosed find a dollar bill for a renewal of my subscription to Lucifer.

Albina L. Washburn, Loveland, Colo.:—Enclosed find $5.00 in labor tender money for the Lucifer Extension; also find a few names to which copies may be sent. I have learned many vital truths from Lucifer the most valuable of which I consider is not to be ashamed of nature. It is hard to displace false education but it can be done and with the young we have every opportunity to preserve the mind uncontaminated with those false ideas of modesty which have prevailed so long to the utter ruin of many of our noblest sons and daughters.

Sada B. Fowler, Torresdale, Phila.—Please accept a donation of six copies of "Irene, or The Road to Freedom" to the noble cause of increasing the circulation. Those who are now so earnestly studying the idea of variety in love will, in "Irene" find helpful thoughts thereon, leading to the spiritual plane of true and pure sex love. The book I am now writing, however, gives the key note above and beyond; and, through the mighty Thought-Power, teaches the true life; by listening in the silence (according to Quaker doctrine) to the still small voice. All questions of reform here find settlement. I am trying to teach the labor reformers in our city of brotherly love (who are now working for the Debs movement,) that in this way will be established the new order of society in the holy spirit of peace and love. I am performing healing by thought power. Do any of your readers desire my aid? They may aid me as they desire.

S. R. Shepherd, Leavenworth, Kan.:—Since Lucifer's work more vitally concerns the happiness and well being of human kind than does that of any other publication I know, I gladly subscribe to the five hundred dollars home missionary fund.

Give a man a chance to be scientifically and properly born—to be born according to the law of God—rather than waste labor in trying to make him outwardly presentable after already having been "conceived in sin and born in iniquity."

I bank more on first than on second births. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Instead of attempting to clarify the stream by filtration and rose water disinfection Lucifer goes to the root of things and seeks to purify the fountain head.

The old marriage fetich is no more sacred and no more exempt from the "higher criticism" of "modern scholarship" and rationalism, in this age of science and reason, than is the Christian Bible or any other relic of barbarism.

Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Va.:—"What the Young Need to Know" is a new book and full of ideas new to the average reader. It is written in the strong, terse, and all-convincing style that permeates everything coming from the pen of E. C. Walker.

Though in viewing the work from a Diana standpoint one must take exception to some of his statements, yet on the whole, there is a world of needed information for the old as well as the young.

There is a whole library of sex knowledge in its forty pages. It commences at the origin of sex and unfolds problem after problem, plainly, simply, yet philosophically.

It advocates free love based upon a proper sexual education and surroundings. Few can read it without learning something new and useful. Few will commence its perusal without reading from cover to cover.

It objects to the idea of sexual satisfaction being reached by the average lover, short of sexual congress; while Dianism proves that, under proper conditions, there is no more need of wasting vital force in that relation, than in shedding tears or ejecting saliva for needless purposes. But on the whole the book is readable, useful and attractive, and the price is within the reach of all. The superstition of "the shame of sex" is extremely well handled. The closing sentence every reader of Lucifer must indorse. "We cannot be free until the sex taboo is taken off every fact and thought of life."

O. N. Bancroft, Gaithersburg, Md.:—I take pleasure in reading Lucifer and am rejoiced to know that through its perusal many can receive the free thoughts of free men, and of free women also. And how much in advance of the present would the world of humanity be today had women always been as free as men to speak and publish their honest thoughts to a needy world. Had such been the case I think no such folly would ever have found expression and belief as that "love is blind," "Love goes where it is sent," etc. The truth is, passion is blind. I hope some day the world will be able to perceive that difference between love and passion. It is my opinion that real love is always the result of respect for its object.

I do not believe true, genuine love can injure, maliciously, revengefully, its object. Love would rather suffer than cause suffering. Hence no person ever takes the life of the one really loved, notwithstanding the great mass of people think the contrary. I am also convinced that what often is mistaken as love is the action of a chemical law of attraction that is subject to change, as constituents of the physical body change. Then repulsion takes place. Of such nature are the majority of unions.

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

CHAPTER LI.

We must now retrace our steps for some months, back to the golden summer time.

In the great eastern metropolis, on the sunny banks of the beautiful Hudson, almost hidden within a grove of wild plum and cherry trees, stands a cosy cottage. Snowy lace curtains drape the windows. Creeping vines almost cover it like a heavy green coverlet. On the shady porches are arranged a profusion and variety of richly blooming plants. The grass plots surrounding the house are dotted with beds of rare flowers which fill the air with fragrance.

But in spite of all the tempting beauty of the place there was an air of desertion about it that one felt rather than saw. The sultry summer day was drawing to its close. Evening was casting its lengthening shadows across the paths. Many of the beautiful blossoms drooped their heads as if weary and sad, while every window and door was closely fastened.

There was not a single sign of life about the place, when suddenly the click of the garden gate was heard and a man with hasty steps came walking up the path. His face was pale and handsome, his eyes blue and his drooping, silky mustache a decided red. The hair of the head, however, was of a darker hue, a handsome brown. He was admitted to the house by an old negress whose face wore an extremely doleful expression.

"Hello! Aunt Betty, what's wrong? Your young mistress is well, I hope?" But not waiting for an answer he pushed by her, and was half way up the stairway when the old woman's voice arrested his footsteps.

"No use, Massa Hunter. The young Misses is not upstairs."

"Not upstairs! Then where is she, pray? Tell me at once."

For answer the old woman covered her face with her snowy apron and burst into tears.

"What is the meaning of this?" the young man demanded. "Has anything happened? Where is Cora? Don't you see how you are torturing me?"

"I don't know. Indeed I don't! She just put on her plainest dress and says to me: 'I is going away, aunty, you can keep dis as a present from me,' and she gi' me a purse all filled with gold. 'You is to remain here,' she says, 'until the massa comes and den you give him dis.' Then she gi' me a lettah, and dat is all I knows."

His face was ashy white and his hand shook as with palsy as the negress handed him the missive which he instinctively knew was a farewell from the one woman who was dearer to him than life. A deadly fear crept into his heart as he went into the little parlor and closed the door as if to shut out the glad sunlight while he read the words that had been penned with a breaking heart. Here and there a stain, a tell-tale mark had been left by a falling tear.

"You will forget," she wrote, "that such a one as I have ever crossed your path. It is better thus. It seems my destiny only to bring pain and suffering to those who love me.

"Do not fear I might sink again to the level on which you found me and from which you rescued me. You have taught me a woman's real worth and no degrading action or word shall ever again soil my life. I was reckless and daring to accept the priceless boon of your love without first inquiring if you were free to love. I did not know, O, I did not know, that law and custom had already bound you to another. I cannot permit you to make a criminal of yourself and when you return I will be gone. Don't seek to find me. What would be the use? The world is wide and somewhere I shall be able to live out this life which consists of so much more pain than joy. I am young and strong, and shall find work somewhere. Good bye! Farewell, my Owen, my lover, and reserve in your memory one little spot of green for your own unhappy

CORA."

The closely written sheets fluttered from his hand and fell unheeded to the floor. His head sank upon his arm where it fell upon the table. Thus he sat long hours. The day had gone out in the gloaming. The twilight hours passed and ushered in the dark night and still he sat there. Then he arose and dragged his weary footsteps to the pretty bed chamber which was to know her no more. There, where he had spent so many sweet and indescribably happy hours, he threw himself upon the bed and buried his face in the snowy pillows which her head had so often pressed.

At sunrise he left the sacred abode. He told the old negress to remain and take care of the little home just the same as if her mistress were there. Giving her a well filled purse he turned his back upon the place where love had been wont to welcome him and went straight to the mansion where dwelt the haughty Leonie, his wife.

"I will never give in! Never! never! I would scratch the eyes out of her white face first!"

The shrill voice almost shrieked the words and the black eyes of the angry woman fairly flashed fire as the white face twitched with fury which transformed it until it became almost hidious.

"I would murder the brazen hussy ere I would——"

"Not another word! I will not hear your vile tongue defame her whose shoes you are not worthy to wipe. You have driven my poor girl away. If sin there be, it is mine. She never knew I had a wife. She was content to give me her love until you drove her forever out of my life. So on that score you can rest easy, but I repeat that I will not continue this farce any longer. I have crossed the threshold of the dwelling that you call home for the last time. I shall sever now and for all time every tie that binds me to you. You can retain this house if you wish it. I do not want it. I shall deposit a million dollars at my bankers to your credit. Then you can apply for a divorce just as soon as you may desire."

To be mistress of this lordly mansion was by no means a small thing. When he made the declaration that she was to retain it together with a princely fortune, an iron band seemed to loosen from about Leonie's throat but she gave no sign of her intense gratification.

Just then the tinkling of a bell was heard in the distance, a few moments later a servant appeared with a card. Before Leonie could step forward, Owen had already secured the card and as the man again noiselessly withdrew he cast a quick glance at the name inscribed thereon and a cold smile overspread his features.

"'Wilson Porter!' Your name, fair lady, has lately often enough been coupled with this one, and as Wilson Porter is neither a fool nor a knave, to the best of my knowledge, I am sorry for him. He deserves a better fate than to be drawn in by a woman of the Leonie Hunter stamp. The immaculate woman who could hurl such withering scorn on an unfortunate sister really ought not to throw stones as she herself is the inmate of a glass house."

He turned and left her standing there, and as he opened the door to pass out he lifted his hat to Wilson Porter who had come to conduct Leonie to Mrs. Van Gorden's reception.

For days and weeks Owen kept up an incessant search for the missing girl but no trace could be found of her whereabouts. His face became haggard, his manner nervous and restless. Sleep fled his eyes, and as summer gave way to autumn, followed by dreary winter, the conviction slowly forced itself upon the mind of the lonely and embittered man that his dream of bliss had ended.

Never in all this time had he seen Leonie. His life with her had been a miserable failure and he never wished to see the dark passionate face again. And in reality Leonie cared very little for the doings of her truant husband. Now as before she queened it in society. As a matter of course it was accepted that Wilson Porter on all occasions should be her escort. The society world had become accustomed to that fact; there was no longer anything new and strange about it.

But if Leonie cared little, Owen cared still less, and as on the clear frosty night of Christmas eve the clanging of the merry bells were calling the orthodox masses both rich and poor to commemorate the birthnight of a world's redeemer, he stood watching the surging masses with a scornful smile curling the finely chiseled lips, he murmured:

"I wonder how much Christian love and charity has done to make the world better. Bah! nothing but cupidity, sordid lust for gain, fills the hearts of one class, whilst superstition, prejudice and ignorance rule the other. The one class rivets the chains; the other hugs them. O how beautiful the world might be if poor groveling humanity would but be natural. Of all things under the sun possessed of life and motion the human family alone is taught it is wrong to be natural, that it is right to outrage nature's laws, even though death be the penalty.

"I wonder if, in all New York tonight, there is one who is more wretchedly poor and desolate than I am with my millions? Of what use are they to me? They cannot buy me happiness."
